members Chris Oliver, executive director, and Nicole Kimball, fisheries analyst. Ivanoff described himself as a subsistence, commercial and sport fisherman in that order. He recalled earning $20,000 in two days of commercial fishing for Chinook salmon with a single permit in July 1985. "I have sons 18 and 12 years old who can't imagine Chinook commercial fishing," he said.

Ivanoff said 50 percent of the Chinook salmon taken as bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery is destined for the AYK region. The size of the area dwarfs Oregon and Washington, both of which have representatives on the council while the AYK region has none, he added.

The incidental bycatch of Chinook salmon in the Bering Sea pollock fishery peaked at 122,000 fish in 2007. Pollock fishers are prohibited by law from selling salmon taken as bycatch, and most of them are returned dead to the sea. In the past decade Chinook salmon runs have diminished drastically in western Alaska streams such as the Yukon and the Unalakleet rivers.

In April 2009 the council recommended a Chinook bycatch management plan that caps the annual bycatch at 60,000 fish. If the cap is reached, the fishery will close. The complex plan includes incentives for pollock industry sectors that are intended to reduce the yearly bycatch well below 60,000 Chinook. Nearly all of the testimony submitted to the council by individuals and groups from the Bering Strait region favored an annual bycatch hard cap of about 30,000 Chinook salmon.

Council may target purse strings in Front Street fight thanks when it comes to funding for a new state building in town.

While they took no action at their April 26 meeting in relation to the state's effort to site a proposed new 60,000-square-foot structure several blocks away from Front Street, council members debated ways to keep one of the larger tenants downtown. To that end, the council had approved a resolution at its last meeting, voicing its wishes that the state make a Front Street location a leading priority in its pursuit of a new facility.

The resolution provoked an April 23 response from Matt Desalernos, the state engineer in charge of the project, saying the state would basically hold the line in choosing a site off of Nome's main drag. "All other things being equal, the Department [of Transportation and Public Facilities] would like to locate a building on Front Street too," Desalernos wrote. "However, the Department has looked at all reasonable options for locating the new building on Front Street and found that none of them are competitive with other available sites in the Nome area."

The state DOT is looking to purchase property at the north end of Steadman Street for the facility.

At the April 26 council meeting, Councilman Jon Larson suggested cutting off the state's purse strings to prevent it from building away from Front Street. "I don't know if they've purchased the property yet," he said. "The only way I think we can stop it is if they don't purchase the property."

Gov. Sean Parnell has promised to go through the capital budget with his red pen to cut down on spending. Larson proposed giving Parnell a suggestion. "We would have to write a letter to the governor and say we don't want it there and ask that he axe the money," Larson said. Councilwoman Mary Knodel agreed, supporting the idea of writing the governor.

Councilman Stan Andersen questioned taking money from the state for one project, such as $5 million for a new museum facility, and asking that other funds be cut out. "We write a letter to say we don't want $2 million here but we want $5 million here?" he said.

Mayor Denise Michels noted the irony of the council's effort to have the state build on Front Street in the midst of approving new flood plain regulations. "At the same time we're going to be passing our own [Federal Emergency Management Agency] map saying it's not good to be building in these areas," she said.

The state has decided Front Street will not be adequate for a new facility for several reasons, paramount among them is the need for space. Desalernos said the largest potentially available lot on Front Street, just west of the Old Federal Building, would not accommodate the de-

Dear Nancy,

I am writing to encourage all cancer survivors in Nome and villages to participate in Relay for Life of Nome Saturday, May 22 and Sunday, May 23. Relay for Life is an event that not only raises money for cancer research and support services for cancer patients, but also raises awareness of the different types of cancers and what we know about them thus far. So far, we have over 10 teams signed up on the Relay for Life Website who have committed themselves to having a team member walking around the track during this

14-hour event. Cancer survivors are invited to kick-off the event by walking the first lap on Saturday, May 22 at 4 p.m. Though it is not required for cancer survivors to walk the first lap, there will be wheelchairs and four-wheelers available for survivors to use in the first lap. Cancer survivors will receive a free T-shirt for participating and there will be a catered dinner on Saturday, May 22 at 6:30 p.m. to honor cancer survivors and one guest each. If you would like to participate, forms are available at the grocery stores and in the Bering Straits Building on Front Street. The deadline to submit your completed form is Wednesday, May 5 and may be submitted at the Radiology Department at Norton Sound Hospital or by calling me (Char Keehn) at 443-3698.

Respectfully Submitted, Char Keehn and The Relay for Life Committee, Nome, AK

Dear Editor

In your article of April 22 concerning the proposed State Office building on Steadman and Sixth Avenue, by Ms. Medearis, I was quoted as stating that the Planning Commission could not approve a preliminary plat if the plat is "commingled" with a vacation. This is incorrect. Vacation of city property is handled by the City of Nome's subdivision regulations adopted by our city council on July 28, 2008. The planning commission, members of which are appointed by the mayor and approved by the city council, of which I am current chair due to Mrs. Irene Anderson's resignation, acts as the platting authority for the City of Nome and under subdivision regulations 70.300, should handle requests for vacations of public utility easements and dedicated public areas. We make recommendations to the city council.

In this case, the state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities went directly to the city council to request a vacation of Sixth Avenue between Steadman and Spokane Street after attending a work session of the planning commission where Mr. Matt Desalernos requested the Planning Commission agree to vacate Sixth Avenue prior to any further work being conducted on behalf of the state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities concerning the purchase of the Alaska Gold Company property because not vacating Sixth Avenue would according to Mr. Desalernos, require the State of Alaska to seek another site, probably off the Bypass Road for the new state office building site.

The planning commission recommended that Mr. Desalernos see the city council because we had nothing to act upon. We had none of the required information found in the City of Nome's vacations regulations spelled out in 70.300(c) which would include an application to vacate a public right of way, five copies of maps (with information required), a written statement containing the reasons in support of the vacation, and a written statement approving the vacation from every public entity authorized to use the dedicated area.

The Nome Common Council, by resolution No. R-10-03-02 approved March 8, agreed to vacate the right of way. Although a subsequent resolution (Resolution No. R-10-04-04) passed by the city council April 12 encourages the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities to seek a Front Street location for the new state office building, it did not rescind the resolution to vacate the right of way. The preliminary plat for the major subdivision created by Alaska Gold Company will come be-

Not a Smart Move

Mom said, "Just because everyone else jumps off a cliff, doesn't mean you have to." Just about everyone's mom says that in some form or another. It was my seventh grade teacher, Sister Mary Patrice, RSM, who taught us that because everyone does something stupid, does not make it right. Our governor, Sean Parnell, did the obstructionist thing and joined a bunch of other Republican governors in a court challenge to health care reform legislation. This is just knee jerk negativity and a waste of Alaska's money.

Gov. Parnell, use some common sense. Don't conform to the monkey-see-monkey-do behavior and get dragged off the cliff. That silly Virginia attorney general couldn't wait for the ink to dry on health care legislation before running to the courthouse— the excuse being that residents of his state can't be required to buy insurance. (Do they have mandatory car insurance requirements in Virginia?) Hey, the Health Care Reform Bill does not become law till 2014. Is it legal to challenge a law when it is not yet a law? This lawsuit challenges the legality of a federal law overruling a state law. Never mind that the U.S. Constitution states that the federal law shall be the "supreme law of the land." Didn't we have a civil war over this? Does desegregation ring a bell? Does civil rights mean anything? Is the Republican challenge a longshot that the conservative Supreme Court might give them some hope that states can block the implementation of federal law?

Parnell's attempt to get Alaska out of health care reform is an insult to Alaskans, silly meaningless and a waste of our money that could be spent on something productive. What's more insulting, although predictable, is for Sen. Lisa Murkowski to agree with Parnell. How much blind partisanship can we stand? The Republicans will go crashing over the cliff for a Tea Party. They will risk everything to make the president look bad, but they haven't reckoned that the Democrats have learned how to play the game. —N.L.M.—

Fairbanksian appointed to Board of Fish

Gov. Sean Parnell named Tanana Chiefs Conference subsistence director Mike Smith of Fairbanks to the state Board of Fisheries. Smith is replacing Janet Woods, who resigned in March after serving not even one year of her three-year appointment. Smith has been a subsistence and commercial fisherman in the Interior and has gained experience in fisheries management issues as a member of the North Pacific Fishery Management Council's Bering Sea Salmon Bycatch Work Group, the Yukon River Panel Technical Comthe Arctic-Yukonmittee, Kuskokwim Sustainable Salmon Initiative, and the Western Arctic Salmon Stock Identification Program. Smith also has served as a state legislative aide and as a member of the Fairbanks Community Health Corp. and Fairbanks Habitat for Humanity.

The seven-member Board of Fisheries is responsible for conservation and development of the state's fisheries by setting seasons, bag limits, methods and means for the state's subsistence, commercial, sport, guided sport, and personal-use fisheries. Two seats expire in June and await the governor's appointments.

Smith's appointment took effect immediately, but is subject to legislative confirmation.

Anti-Pebble group protest mine in London

For the second year now, Bristol Bay leaders traveled to London to urge mining giant Anglo American to abandon the proposed Pebble Mine. Although Iceland's volcanic activity hampered air traffic, the Alaskans made it to London in time to the Anglo American shareholder meeting on April 22. The group confronted the company's executives and shareholders saying that there is strong local opposition to building the proposed Pebble Mine in the headwaters of spawning habitat for wild sockeve salmon.

Parnell signs in-state gas line law

Governor Sean Parnell signed into law a precursor to an in-state gas line. The legislation creates a joint in-state gas line development team and establishes an in-state gas line project coordinator in statute. The bill directs the Alaska Housing Finance Corporation to oversee the instate gas line project plan and also sets up an advisory council.

Hero dog gets Trooper's recognition

Alaska State Troopers bestowed a special honor on a German shepherd dog named "Buddy" for his valiant actions during a fire at Caswell, north of Wasilla, on April 4. The dog guided Talkeetna Trooper Terrence Shanigan to the fire and saved responders valuable time to search for the location in the maze of Caswell's back roads. The fire broke out in a workshop where the dog's owner Ben Heinrich was working on a vehicle. Heinrich told the dog that they need to get help and when escaping the flames in the shop, the dog disappeared into the dark woods.

Meanwhile, Trooper Terrence Shanigan received a frantic phone call from a neighbor that there was a fire in Caswell. Unable to pinpoint the location and hampered by a failing GPS, Shanigan drove towards the Hidden Hills subdivision, a labvrinth of 75 miles of dirt roads. Shanigan said that he then saw the dog, waiting at the intersection. The trooper followed "Buddy" as the canine was running ahead of the car. After 1.5 miles, the dog had directed him to the burning workshop.

From there on, Shanigan was able to direct firefighters to the fire's location and their fast response saved the house. "Buddy's" owner Ben Heinrich had second-degree burns to his face and hands, the shop was a complete loss, but the main residence could be saved. On Friday afternoon, Buddy was recognized with an engraved stainless steel bowl and a letter of appreciation for his diligence in assisting a state trooper. Trooper director Colonel Audie Holloway led the ceremony at the Troopers' headquarters in Anchorage.

Snake River bridge project to get underway this summer

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System has received an order to relocate utility lines that conflict with the state's project to relocate the Snake River Bridge that leads from Seppala Drive to Port Road.

The new bridge replaces an existing bridge that has been patched with repairs for years, and has been found inadequate to handle increasing traffic to the Port of Nome area. The state Department of Transportation intends to leave the old bridge in place for foot traffic.

The utility has been looking at federal FEMA funds to underwrite the cost, but will now receive money for the relocation from the state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities, utility manager John K. Handeland told the utility board April 20.

The timeline for the bridge work calls for bid advertisement to go out by October. Two electrical power lines crossing the river will have to move before then. Water and sewer lines along Port Road and Seppala Drive are also in conflict with the relocation. Utility location agreements must be completed before DOT can authorize any relocation work. To this end, DOT has authorized NJUS to proceed with preliminary engineering to prepare plans and cost estimates—including wages, long-distance phone calls, travel and per diem, equipment rental surveying, right of way agent costs, vehicle fees and consultant contract fees. Money will flow and work will begin after a relocation agreement has been signed between NJUS and DOT.

NJUS is going through three options with DOT for carrying the lines across the gap: aerial placement, under the bridge, or under the Snake River. So far, the best option is going under the river, Handeland said. Putting the power lines on 70-foot towers has been considered, Handeland said, but he did not think that solution had a long life with planners. Utility board member Carl Emmons commented that the clearance would not be high enough in some cases.

In other utility business: A mechanic from Wartsila, makers of the city's new electric generators, found no mechanical issues in a routine inspection due after 12,000 hours of operation.

A utility vehicle use policy requires manager approval to park near employee homes to be ready to respond to emergencies and approval to take vehicles past city limits. No use of vehicles will be allowed for personal use.

sired floor space, adequate parking or potential to expand desired by the state. Desalernos wrote that the state would most likely build at two-story structure with 30,000 square feet on each floor.

Desalernos' letter also addressed the other components of the council's April 12 resolution which asked the state to consider having a private party build to its specifications and then lease the space to agencies. Desalernos said his agency has not been directed to consider leasing space, and even if it had, the state's procurement process would not likely allow a restriction on where the space be located. "As a result viable proposals could be submitted for a variety of locations in the Nome area," he wrote.

The resolution also asked the state to work with the city, the Nome Chamber of Commerce and the citizens of Nome in the process. Desalernos wrote that the state has been working cooperatively with the city for a year and a half, and considers the city the appropriate contact representing the community.

Another city entity, the Nome Planning Commission, will take up the issue of a preliminary plat filed by Alaska Gold Co. that would consolidate a number of lots to larger parcels. It is one of those parcels that the state would like to purchase. Nome City Manager Josie Bahnke said the May 4 meeting would serve as another chance for the pubic to comment on the project. "That's another public meeting where folks will be meeting face to fact with DOT," she told the council.

Desalernos noted in his letter that even if the property were purchased, not all state agencies may end up in the facility. "The final configuration of the new building is far from set in stone," he wrote. "Once a site is acquired, the next stop will be to negotiate written commitments form each agency that has expressed an interest in being located in the new facility. When it comes time for the legislature to fund the construction phase of the project they may not choose to fully fund the project. If that happens, some agencies will have to look at other options for housing their operations. Should that happen some of those agencies could choose to locate their operations of Front Street or elsewhere in the community."

Swimming pool and boilers projects green-lighted

In other business, the Nome Common Council approved the awarding of a contract to Bering Straits Development Co. to replace the Nome Elementary School boilers and perform upgrades for the Nome Swimming Pool. Of the three bidders for the project, BSDC submitted the low bid of $724,656 for the projects that were estimated to cost $592,223. Alaska Mechanical had submitted a bid for $854,000 and Aaron Plumbing and Heating bid $1,028,803. Randy Romenesko, the acting projects manager for the city, said he believed the winning bid represented the true cost of the project.

Nome Public Schools will contribute $500,000 to the project with the city picking up the remainder. The city had planned to contribute the $100,000 it received from the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. community share program.

In his report, Romenesko said the city's administration identified an additional $170,000 in funds that could be used. The money is excess from appropriations for school renovations from 2001 to the present. The extra money surprised Councilman Stan Andersen. "I thought there wasn't any extra money in those accounts," Andersen said.

City Manager Josie Bahnke said the city controller, Cussy Kauer, had performed a reconciliation of school bond funds and came up with the excess money. "I was led to believe there were no funds, now I see $170,000," Andersen said. "We need to reconcile these every year. Are there any other funds like this out there?"

Mining permit approved

The council also gave its blessing to the renewal of a placer mining permit for Robert M. Sanders and his operation, Nome AK Gold Concentrates LLC. The operation takes place in the Moonlight Wells Protection area, a buffer zone the city regulates around the community's drinking water source. Councilman Andersen requested that a fee be put on the permit process for next year to cover the work in issuing it. He also asked that the city engineer pay site visits to ensure the operation is adhering to the regulations. "If there are problems and we ignore it, then the onus is on us," he said.

Bowling alley progress questioned

Councilman Andersen also questioned the city's administration as to where the process stood on deciding what to do with the Nome Recreation Center's idled bowling alley. Bahnke said she believed the city needed to come up with a request for proposals for an entity to run the alley if it were to go back in operation. She also noted that a firm understanding of the needed upgrades for the facility. "We need to get together and find out where we're at before they start screaming again," Andersen said, referring to the public effort mounted to get the alley up and running again.

travel routes open. She said when it comes to addressing emerging Arctic issues as the climate changes, the state and federal governments have an incredible amount of work to accomplish. "We're so far behind the ball and we need to get caught up," she said.

Michels tempers her push for development with a call to get the blessing of local populations before moving forward with projects. "The most important part of these studies is to get the community support," she said.

Michels said her experience as mayor has provided her with many valuable lessons, including the art of compromise and consultation. That position has also allowed her to gain some exposure on the statewide level as the past president of both the Alaska Municipal League and the Alaska Conference of Mayors.

Despite leading those two organizations and serving on former Gov. Sarah Palin's transition team for the Department of Military and Veteran Affairs, Michels acknowledges she has work to do in getting her name and platform out to voters across the state. "Being in a small town, not Anchorage, Fairbanks or Juneau, my name is not as well known," she said. "I need to meet people in the bigger cities."

To that end, Michels said she is working on setting up fundraisers in Anchorage and Fairbanks, and getting herself before some of the trade and industry organizations headquartered in the state's larger communities.

Michels said coming from rural Alaska also gives her an understanding of some of the state's issues that candidates from larger cities lack. "I bring a unique perspective being from here," she said.

So far, Michels' campaign is a team of one. "I'm jumping in here by myself," she said. Michels said she is just starting to lay the groundwork for her campaign in areas such as fundraising, travel and communication through a campaign website and e-mail address. She also stresses that in the midst of all this, she is still attending to her duties as mayor of Nome.

The same day Michels announced her intent to file, Democratic gubernatorial candidate and former state Representative Ethan Berkowitz issued his own press release praising both her qualifications and entrance into the race. Michels returned the favor, not quite endorsing Berkowitz, but speaking highly of him nonetheless. "Ethan has a very strong understanding of the Legislature and he's been in rural Alaska," she said.

Joining Berkowitz in the Democratic primary race are state Sen. Hollis French and Bob Poe. Michels diplomatically tipped her hat to all three "All of them are really good candidates," she said. "There is a very qualified slate of individuals who want to take that leadership role."

According to the state elections website, on the Republican ticket for lieutenant governor are Eddie Burke, Mark Ewing and state Rep. Jay Ramras. Current Lt. Gov. Craig Campbell had declared his candidacy, but then later withdrew from the race. Others running for governor in the August primary are current Republican Gov. Sean Parnell and fellow Republicans Ralph Samuels, Bill Walker, Gerald Heikes, Merica Hlatcu and Sam Little. Alaskan Independence candidate Donald Wright has also filed to run for governor.

Michels is currently employed as the director of transportation for Kawerak Inc. She is a former business owner, having run Fort Davis Roadhouse restaurant. She also previously worked for Statewide Petroleum Service in Anchorage and Sitnasuak Native Corp. in Nome.

produced physicians, lawyers and engineers. "There is the intelligence to serve on the council, but we have no representative," he said. "It is a slap and an insult to us."

Oliver told Ivanoff he understands his frustration, but the composition of the council is determined by Congress. During his panel presentation, Oliver explained that the Magnuson-Stevens Act provides a framework for the council and its processes. He said there is a process for applying for Alaska seats on the council.

The 11 voting members of the council include the directors of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game, the Washington Department of Fish and Wildlife, and the Oregon Department of Fish and Wildlife; the regional administrator of the National Marine Fisheries Service Alaska regional office; and seven private citizens, five members from Alaska and two from Washington, who are appointed by the Secretary of Commerce from lists submitted by the governors of Alaska and Washington.

Roy Ashenfelter of Nome asked Oliver to bring a message to the council encouraging representation from the Bering Strait region. "We need representation for these decisions that affect our subsistence way of life," he said.

Oliver replied that the council does make decisions about council membership and is prohibited from lobbying Congress.

Cynthia Ahwinona of Nome, a member of the Nome Eskimo Com-Tribal Council, asked whether the council can notify communities affected by bycatch issues when an Alaska council seat is open and explain how to apply for it.

"That's a good suggestion," Kimball replied. She said expiration dates for three-year terms on the council appear on the council's website. The council doesn't send out letters with that information but will consider Ahwinona's request, she added.

Kimball summarized the council's work on issues of vital interest to Bering Strait residents. She said the proposed rule for the Chinook bycatch management plan for the pollock fishery (Amendment 91) was published in the Federal Registry March 23, the deadline for public comment is May 7, and the proposed rule will go to the Secretary of Commerce for approval.

Kimball said the council has sought solutions to salmon bycatch in the pollock fishery since 2005 when the bycatch of chums soared to 700,000 fish. She outlined three alternatives the council is considering for limiting chum salmon bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery. The alternatives will be discussed in a statewide public teleconference May 4. (See details about the teleconference in this edition.)

Teams of council members and staff will present information about the proposed plan and gather feedback at community meetings in nine regions early on 2011, reported Kimball, who serves as staff for the council's Rural Community Outreach Committee, Council teams conducted similar outreach meetings on the Chinook bycatch management alternatives in late 2008 and early 2009. Kimball said final action on a chum salmon bycatch management plan is tentatively scheduled at the June 2011 council meeting in Nome.

Northern Bering Sea Research Area

In 2008 the Northern Bering Sea Research Area was established and closed to bottom trawl fishing, as recommended by the council in 2007. The NBRSA boundaries encompass the Bering Sea from the Nelson Island area to Bering Strait.

Little commercial fishing has taken place in the NBSRA, but species including flatfish targeted by bottom trawlers reportedly are extending their range northward under a warming climate. Dr. Franz Mueter of the University of Alaska Fairbanks School of Fisheries and Ocean Sciences reports a long-term northward shift in the center of distribution for a majority of 39 fish and shellfish species since the 1980s.

The council closed the NBRSA to bottom trawling as a precautionary measure to create a research plan to identify future protection measures needed for sea mammals, crab species, endangered or threatened species and subsistence resources in the area.

Kimball said representatives of 25 villages attended a community and subsistence workshop Feb. 24-25 in Anchorage to discuss a research plan for the NBSRA and a trawl survey that NMFS plans to conduct in the area this summer.

The April edition of the council's newsletter News & Notes reports the council reviewed concerns expressed by community and tribal representatives at the workshop when the council met in early April in Anchorage. According to the newsletter, the workshop participants see a need for NMFS to foster ongoing communication and participation with communities and tribes throughout the development of the plan; a need for tribal consultation and outreach with the agency prior to commercial bottom trawling in the NBRSA, including the scheduled 2010 summer trawl survey; and a need to slow down the process for developing the research plan.

The council also reviewed a letter from William Karp dated March 26 to all workshop participants with detailed information about NMFS' plan to extend the annual eastern Bering Sea shelf bottom trawl survey to the Northern Bering Sea this summer. Karp is deputy science and research director, Alaska Region, NMFS.

'The letter outlines the objectives of the survey (to understand the impacts of the loss of sea ice on groundfish, shellfish and marine mammals), the timing (late July/early August), and the total seafloor area to be trawled by the research trawl (1.75 square nautical miles, or 0.003 percent of the total northern Bering Sea survey area)," the newsletter reports. "The letter also includes an invitation for one or two biologists representing communities to participate as part of the scientific field staff. NMFS also plans to host an open house on one of the survey ships in Nome during the survey."

The council approved a revised schedule provided by NMFS' Alaska Fisheries Science Center to add four months to the timeline for development of the NBSRA research plan, according to News & Notes. "The delayed schedule would accommodate a science meeting in January 2011, allow incorporation of the results from the summer 2010 trawl survey, as well as provide additional time to engage with Alaska Native tribes and rural communities, including a follow-up workshop in March 2011," the newsletter reports. The council recommended that the science meeting include community and subsistence stakeholders.

The council and Bering Strait tribes are not on the same page. In recent weeks, 12 tribal councils in the Bering Strait region and the Kawerak Inc. board of directors have adopted resolutions opposing the bottom trawling survey that NMFS plans to conduct this summer in the NBSRA. The tribes are Brevig Mission, King Island, Koyuk, Mary's Igloo, St. Michael, Savoonga, Shishmaref, Solomon, Teller, Unalakleet, Wales and White Mountain. The resolutions were not discussed during the Bering Sea Issues Forum, but copies of them were available on a table with forum materials.

The resolutions state that research requires prior consultation and coordination with federally recognized tribes that may be impacted by the research or its results; NMFS has neither formally informed tribes of, nor conducted government-to-government consultation on, the proposed bottom trawl research; residents of the region depend on marine mammals as subsistence resources and depend on a healthy benthic (bottom) habitat as forage for the animals used for subsistence; bottom trawl fisheries are globally recognized as being destructive to benthic habitat; and the tribes are opposed to the expansion of commercial bottom trawl fisheries into the NBSRA

Other Bering Sea Issues Forum panelists were Fred Phillip of Kwigillingok representing the Bering Sea Elders Advisory Group: Jason Anderson, manager of the Best Use Cooperative, a trawl fishery harvesting cooperative of 17 catcher-vessels that target Bering Sea flatfish; Katie Moerlein, a master's degree student at the University of Alaska Fairbanks School of Fisheries and Ocean Sciences who is working on a study of climate change and subsistence fisheries in three northwest Alaska villages; and Bubba Cook, senior fisheries officer for Kamchatka and the Bering Sea Ecoregion, World Wildlife Fund. Julie Raymond-Yakoubian, Kawerak cultural anthropologist, planned and moderated the forum.

Changing subsistence

Panelists who provided updates on subsistence issues April 20 at the Kawerak Regional Conference were Carol Daniel, an attorney who represents the Alaska Federation of Natives; Vera Metcalf, program director for the Eskimo Walrus Commission; Michael Sloan, Kawerak fisheries biologist; and Raymond-Yakoubian.

During a discussion of reasons for diminished Norton Sound salmon runs that ranged from mismanagement by the Alaska Department of Fish and Game to interception of salmon bound for Norton Sound by Area M fishers to salmon bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery, Eugene Asicksik of Shaktoolik suggested that subsistence users also look at changes that have taken place in their practices.

Asicksik is a former president and chief executive officer of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which represents 15 member villages in the Bering Strait region in the Western Alaska Community Development Program. The CDQ program receives an allocation of 10.7 percent of the annual total allowable catch of Bering Sea pollock. He acknowledged that some of the issues CDO entities addressed in federal legislation such as the MSA and the American Fisheries Act have had impacts. "My job was to improve the bottom line of NSEDC and Glacier Fish Co. [NSEDC's pollock harvesting partner]," he said.

In 2008 after living in Anchorage for a number of years, Asicksik returned to Shaktoolik where he engages in commercial and subsistence fishing. He said subsistence users bring fish harvested for dry fish back to the village whole instead of setting up a camp, cutting fish and returning their innards to the river to provide nutrients for the next generation of salmon. "We need to look within," he said. "Our modes of harvesting have changed drastically."

In an interview with The Nome Nugget, Asicksik said people no longer have many dogs, so they don't harvest trout to feed them. "Men would go upriver and fill gunny sacks with 50 to 100 pounds of trout for dog feed," he recalled. "Trout eat a lot of salmon fry in the spring. You see tails sticking out of the trouts' mouths." Today trout fishers go upriver on snowmobiles, quickly cut several holes in the ice with augers and perhaps harvest silver and king salmon smolt along with trout, he added

Asicksik said he gave information about changes in river ice conditions in spots salmon no longer use for spawning to Moerleine as input for her study of climate change and subsistence fisheries.

Teleconference scheduled May 4 on chum bycatch

The North Pacific Fishery Management Council is evaluating measures to limit chum salmon bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery. The public can learn about alternatives being considered, learn the council process, and voice questions and concerns by participating in a teleconference Tuesday, May 4 from 9 a.m. to 11 a.m.

The teleconference number is (888)248-0699, code 9589.

This process is open to the public.

Council analysts will be on the line to share information and answer questions. The call will be recorded and moderated

Those planning to ask a question, should RSVP via e-mail to nicole.kimball@noaa.gov or call the council at (907) 271-2809 with their name, location and question. Due to the potential for a large number of participants, the RSVP list will have first priority for questions. The council asks each participant to limit questions to two minutes.

A short PowerPoint presentation will be given at the beginning of the call. For participants who want a copy of the PowerPoint presentation, it will be posted one week prior to the call at www.alaskafisheries.noaa.gov/npfmc/.

o live to 100 years old takes a mixture of good genes, clean living, faith and no shortage of grit.

To make it to the century mark after beating polio, diabetes, cancer and a heart attack is nothing short of inspiring. But to speak with Frances Johnson's loved ones, the family matriarch who survived all those ailments and just marked her 100th birthday April 23 is an inspiration in and of herself. "We don't have many elders in our area that have outlived the hardships of the early lifestyle and the illnesses of the times, being what they were," said Johnson's daughter, Carolyn Schubert.

Surrounded by her children, grandchildren, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and a large assortment of nieces, nephews, friends and acquaintances, Johnson was honored at the Munaqsri Center on Friday. The celebration included a large assortment of food, birthday cake, song, 100 white roses and a number of people and organizations stepping up to give donations to the Bering Straits Foundation and the Relay for Life in Johnson's name.

The effects of Alzheimer's disease did not allow Johnson to address the crowd gathered in her honor, but she smiled at several points during the celebration, like when she was shown old family photos, when Nome Covenant Church Pastor Harvey Fiskeaux played guitar and sang at her feet and when she was presented with her cake.

Johnson was born at Atnik, a remote village on Golovin Bay, in 1910. She was the fifth of eight children to Eunice and Mathew Kokochurok. Her exact date of birth was unknown, and she was later assigned April 23.

As a toddler, Johnson was stricken by polio. Schubert said some of her mother's first memories were of not being able to walk. But like she would with several other illness later in life, Johnson overcame the childhood disease and grew up living a traditional lifestyle that included no shortage of work. With no older brothers, Johnson did not shy away from what was dubbed "man's work." She drove dog teams, hunted game, seined for fish, worked in the local saltry and trapped fur-bearing animals. She also tanned furs and later became a master seamstress, fashioning seven traditional fur dress parkas, two of which were given statewide awards.

Johnson is trilingual, speaking Inupiaq, Yupik and English. She carried on many Inupiaq legends, stories and songs, and translated many hymns from English to Inupiaq.

She married Albert Johnson of Council in 1933 and raised eight children. She lost her husband 33 years ago to cancer. It was a disease she knew herself, having survived a bout with breast cancer. Always one to pass on knowledge, she shared her experiences in a breast cancer awareness video.

Johnson was named Mrs. Arctic Native Brotherhood Queen in 1982 in Nome. In 1991 she was named the Elder of the Year for Council Native Corp. and Bering Straits Native Corp. for sharing and passing on the cultural traditions of her people. Johnson has even had her brush

Johnson has even had her brush with Hollywood. Schubert remembered how her mother auditioned for a spot in the Steven Seagal movie, On Deadly Ground, in the 1990s. In her 80s, Johnson was determined to attend the auditions which were being held at the Hotel Captain Cook in Anchorage. In her traditional parka, Johnson stood in the long line outside the hotel for her chance to audition. When they arrived in the hotel, Schubert said Seagal saw Johnson and immediately came to her. "He walked over to mother, grabbed her hands, and said, 'You are much too beautiful for a part in my movie, but let me talk to you," Schubert said.

She said Seagal ordered several trays of food for her mother and invited her to stay as long as she wanted. "Just by being her cute little self in her 80s, she impressed one of Hollywood's biggest starts," Schubert said.

At 100, Johnson continues to impress. Her celebration included the presentation of a legislative citation that honors her achievements and longevity.

Alaska sues federal government over health care reform

By Diana Haecker

Alaska and 20 other states are banding together to sue the federal government over the constitutionality of the federal heath care reform that passed in March. The state's decision comes after Attorney General Dan Sullivan issued a legal memorandum in which he recommended to challenge the federal government on constitutional grounds.

The new health care legislation requires citizens to purchase health insurance coverage beginning in 2014 or else pay a fine of $695 a year or 2.5 percent of their annual income. This, Gov. Sean Parnell said, is well beyond the scope of the federal government's authority and would infringe on the lives and the freedom of Alaskans. "This case is ultimately about the extent to which the federal government can exert power over the states," Parnell said in a statement. "It has critical implications for the liberty interests of all American citizens. Alaska must join this important litigation."

The Department of Law's 48-page legal memorandum found that most of the legal theories challenging the federal act do not raise serious constitutional issues, but that the individual mandate was the most troubling and constitutionally suspect provision of the federal act.

The lawsuit asserts that the U.S.

Constitution's commerce clause prohibits Congress from requiring Americans to purchase a good or service.

In a statement, the governor said that the decision to sue is more about Alaskans' liberty interests than about health care legislation. "Health insurance coverage is not in the public interest if it's achieved through a constitutional short-cut that expands federal power at the expense of states' rights and the liberties of citizens," he said.

A critical comment from U.S. Sen. Mark Begich sparked a different controversy—about costs of the litigation. "At a time when Alaska's unemployment rate is at record highs and families are struggling to make ends meet, the administration of Governor Sean Parnell has decided to spend countless hours and hundreds of thousands of dollars on a lawsuit of dubious merit which is unlikely to be successful," Begich said. The Parnell administration fired back and issued a statement saying that the comments were "erroneous" and that any outside legal costs and expenses paid by

... "shocking" that there was no opposition to the bill as it directly involves a Native Corporation, the state of Alaska and the BLM.

- Rep. Don Young

Alaska would not exceed $5,000.

Spokesman Bill McAllister said that in drafting the memorandum for the governor, the Department of Law spent the necessary time in researching and analyzing the important constitutional issues raised by the health

"The worst part of playing politics in this manner is the direct cost to taxpayers in wasted state time and resources that will result in challenging a law that years of court precedence and legal opinions have all held to be perfectly constitutional."

- Patti Higgins, Alaska Democratic Party Chair

care legislation.

While Begich condemned the lawsuit, Sen. Lisa Murkowski said she was highly encouraged that Alaska has chosen to join the other states to challenge the constitutionality of the law. She said that she had been opposed to what she calls the "onerous individual mandate" and that she had supported a measure that would have allowed states to opt out of the health care plan, but that didn't go through. Congressman Don Young issued a statement supporting Gov. Parnell. "The recently passed health care legislation was a steep infringement on the liberties of the American people and an intrusion into their lives," said Young. "The health care legislation is absolutely unconstitutional and joining in this lawsuit is the right thing to do for Alaskans."

Young said he already signed on as a cosponsor to a bill to repeal the health care legislation.

On the state level, Democratic Party chairwoman Patti Higgins told The Nome Nugget that the lawsuit is yet another example of political theatre that Alaskans do not want or need. "The worst part of playing politics in this manner is the direct cost to taxpayers in wasted state time and resources that will result in challenging a law that years of court precedence and legal opinions have all held to be perfectly constitutional," Higgins said.

She said that instead of arranging political theater with frivolous lawsuits, the Alaska Democratic Party calls on Gov. Parnell to show the leadership on healthcare that Alaskans have found missing in the governor's office for "Alaskans want our governor to address the issues that Alaskans care about head on: how can the state help bring down the costs of healthcare for our small businesses? How can we bring down the number of uninsured that clog our emergency rooms and drive up our premiums? How do we make sure our seniors can afford the prescriptions they need? Finding solutions to these problems are a much better use of our governor's and our state's time and resources," Higgins said.

The lead plaintiff is the state of Florida. It's attorney general Bill McCollum is a Republican running for governor. He said that Alaska was the latest state to join the Florida-led complaint, reports the Washington Post. Virginia has filed a separate lawsuit, saying that the individual mandate to buy health insurance clashes with a state law that exempts Virginians from federal fines to be imposed for not owning health insurance.

The Washington Post also reports that the U.S. Justice Department signaled that it would vigorously fight any challenges to the new healthcare law. The White House has also said it believes the suits will fail.

Salmon Lake lands inch closer toward conveyance to BSNC

By Diana Haecker

Almost 40 years in the making, the Bering Straits Native Corporation may soon see conveyance of a culturally important part of their Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act selection, namely lands near Salmon Lake, at Windy Cove and along the northshore of Imruk Basin.

Last week, the House Resources Committee in Washington, D.C., held a hearing on the so-called Salmon Lake Land Selection Resolution Act. The act aims to solidify an agreement between the Bureau of Land Management, the State of Alaska and BSNC to solve conflicting land claims.

In 1977, BSNC selected the lands in question, but in 1997, BLM decided to reject the selection for regulatory reasons. BSNC decided to pursue ownership of the area by appealing the rejection at the Interior Board of Land Appeals. After going through the appeal process, the case ended back on the BLM's desk. At that point, BSNC had already spent $100,000 in legal fees, according to BSNC CEO Gail Schubert's testimony during the April 21 hearing at the House Natural Resources Committee. Faced with the possibility that the land selection could be lost in the event that the appeal fails, BSNC negotiated a settlement with the state and BLM starting in 2004. The agreement was signed in 2007 and now it takes an act of congress to finalize the deal.

The Senate held hearings last fall and, after minor changes, put the bill on the Senate calendar. Gail Schubert and vice-president of Lands and Resources Matt Ganley attended the House committee hearing in Washington, D.C., last week. Schubert testified and asked the committee members for a favorable consideration to pass the legislation. A final vote in both chambers is still pending.

The Salmon Lake land selection agreement says that the federal government would convey 1,009 acres near Salmon Lake to BSNC as well as 6,132 acres at Windy Cove, north of the Kigluaik Mountains, and 7,504 acres of land at the delta of Agiapuk

River on the north shore of the Imruk Basin. The lands are contiguous with BSNC or other village corporation lands. Under the same agreement, the State of Alaska would get a selection of 3,084 acres near Salmon Lake, also adjacent to state lands. Access to state waters and other public lands is assured through public easements over the lands to be conveyed.

Gail Schubert told The Nome Nugget on Monday that the selections of those lands were primarily done for the lands' importance to subsistence activities, especially red salmon, caribou, berry and greens harvests. Salmon Lake is one of the westernmost sockeye salmon spawning lakes in North America.

During the committee hearing last week, California congresswoman Grace Napolitano inquired whether BSNC had plans to develop the selected lands, especially the wetlands north of Imruk basin, but Schubert said that there are no plans for development as the lands were chosen for their subsistence val-

Don Young introduced the bill in the resource committee and remarked that he found it "shocking" that there was no opposition to the bill as it directly involves a Native corporation, the State of Alaska and the BLM. He said it's a rare thing that all parties agree. He also asked Schubert whether recently proposed BLM budget cuts would affect BSNC's land conveyances as federal money is needed to pay for surveying lands. Schubert said that most lands to be conveyed to BSNC have been already surveyed, but as a board member of the Alaska Federation of Natives, she has concerns that other Alaska Native corporations may be impacted.

Matt Ganley explained that there is no land swap or exchange involved and that BSNC is not going to get more land than it is entitled to with this transaction. A press release from Sen. Lisa Murkowski's office had referred to the matter as a "land swap." Ganley had been part of the negotiations and is hopeful that Congress will pass the bill soon.

Once passed, the agreement is ratified and since the lands are already surveyed, conveyance is expected not to take too long.

BSSD is 18 strong to NYO

Endurance, coordination and strength are basic survival requirements in any culture, but perhaps none more so than the Native peoples of the Arctic. They were the determining factor between life and death. The development of these vital skills were woven through the culture, even into competitive games. While much of the actual life/death struggle has changed, the spiritual importance and cultural connections are still there and Native Youth Olympics, which were on display in Anchorage April 22-24.

The Bering Strait School District team was 18 strong including athletes from Gambell, Savoonga, Teller, White Mountain, Golovin, Elim, Koyuk Unalakleet and Stebbins. Some, like Stebbins' Fabian Pete (whose family has won 10 consecutive BSSD Seal Hop titles) carried historical context and expectations. Others, like Unalakleet's Max Fancher brought enthusiasm and a new found love for the sport. All were well prepared and ready for the State NYO tournament in Anchorage.

Things got off to a great start as the youngest member of the BSSD team, Apaay Campbell pulled off a stunning victory in the girl's Kneel Jump. Her gold medal performance set the tone for the entire team. She was followed by very strong performances by Tashina Esparza (Silver Medal – Wrist Carry) and then a second BSSD gold medal by Fancher in the Toe Kick. As the successes continued the team expectations began to rise.

With team mates encouraging and cheering them on each athlete went out and gave all they had, often reaching personal bests and breaking District records in the process. Vincent Tomalonis (White Mountain) earned a bronze medal in Indian Stick Pull and Pete successfully carried the family name to a bronze medal in Seal Hop. Unalakleet's Katiya Erickson returned to exceed the BSSD 2 Foot High Kick record and grab a 4th place finish. Two first time State qualifiers, both from Unalakleet, had impressive results: Jodi Gilley placed 4th in Indian Stick Pull and Štuart Towarak jumped to a 5th place finish in the crowd favorite, Canadian One Foot High Kick.

The efforts of these young athletes was rewarded as they placed 4th in Team points and, in a great honor, were selected for the Team Sportsmanship award. This was well-deserved as all team members competed honorably under the excellent coaching leadership of Nick Hanson and Laureli Kineen.

Many of those attending the State NYO championships will be graduating and moving on to other things, but the expectations are upheld and next year a new group of young NYO athletes will rise to fill their spots and continue to perpetuate these important values and skills.

Fullwood takes the Cannonball

www.kotzebueracing.com.

Minimal snow in and around Nome this spring pushed the annual Cannonball Race north from its traditional start on the sea ice to Dexter. On Sunday Joe Fullwood topped a field of 10 racers who took to an altered course that ran 11 miles along the flanks of Newton Peak and King Mountain.

Peter Reich Sr., Winter Jones.

The traditional course runs broad laps around Nome, beginning on the sea ice in front of town, racing toward Dexter and looping west to the Snake River before turning back toward Nome. This year's course featured an 11-mile snowcrossstyle track. The race was a 10-lap, 110mile course with a Dead Man Le Mans style start, which has racers running to their machines at the start. After a rules review, the addition to the race of 16- and 17-year-old racers was allowed, with parental permission.

Reducing added sugar DOCTOR may raise your good cholesterol

By Bob Lawrence, MD

Have you had trouble getting your good cholesterol high enough? Try holding off on added sugars. According to a new study, there seems to be a connection between consumption of added dietary sugars and a person's High Density Lipoprotein (HDL), or good cholesterol.

The research, published in last week's Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA), shows that people who consume a higher amount of added dietary sugars from sodas, fruit drinks, foods with high fructose corn syrup, or boxed cereals are twice as likely to have a low HDL cholesterol compared to those who get less than 5 percent of their energy intake from added sugar.

Worse yet, researchers also found that high sugar consumption is associated with high triglycerides, a type of fat found in the blood.

The new data is important because the pattern of having a low HDL and high triglycerides in otherwise healthy individuals is called dyslipidemia, a pattern known to be associated with underlying problems in the cardiovascular system. But many patients find it hard to raise their HDL and lower their triglyceride numbers even when taking cholesterol medications. The new research suggests the problem may be America's ever-growing sweet tooth.

Added sugars are defined as sugars or syrups added to sweeten foods during processing. The added sugar provides energy just like natural sugars, but unlike the natural sugars found in fruits and vegetables, added sugar provides no additional nutrients like vitamins, minerals or fiber. Dieticians often call added sugars "empty calories."

A growing body of evidence has linked added sugar in the diet to many metabolic and cardiovascular problems including obesity, diabetes mellitus type II and cardiovascular disease. Research from the Framingham Heart Study published in the journal Circulation in 2007 suggested a link between consumption of one or more sugary sodas daily and a person's risk for developing high blood pressure.

People in the Norton Sound region have witnessed the effects of this alarming trend first hand. Traditionally, people in the Norton Sound region have had one of the healthiest diets in the world, one that is low in added sugar and high in healthy fats.

The Genetics of Coronary Artery Disease in Alaska Natives (GOCO-DAN) has shown that a diet rich in traditional Native foods like salmon, seal oil and sea mammals is associated with lower triglycerides and LDL (bad cholesterol) but a higher HDL (good cholesterol). Unfortunately, economic and social pressures in the region have resulted in a transition away from a healthy diet to one that is high in simple carbohydrates full of added sugar. The dietary changes are linked to the increasing levels of diabetes mellitus II and heart disease seen throughout rural Alaska.

So how do we lower the amount of added sugar in our diet? The primary sources of added sugar in the American diet are soft drinks (pop), fruit juices and sugary beverages. Switching to water and unsweetened beverages can significantly reduce the number of empty calories consumed daily. This may be a challenge in villages where pop and sugary drinks are less expensive than water.

You may also consider using half the syrup, jelly or dressing you would normally use on foods. If given the choice between fruit and a sugary snack, consider the fruit, which will satisfy the craving for something sweet while supplying additional fiber and vitamins.

For women, the American Heart Association recommends limiting the total number of calories consumed from added sugar to 100 calories (about 6 teaspoons) daily; and for men, the recommendation is to limit added sugars to 150 calories (about 9 teaspoons) daily. For reference, one 12 oz can of soda contains between 8 and 9 teaspoons of added sugar (130-140 calories).

Giving up a favorite pop or juice may sound difficult at first. However, fresh fruit or berries will provide the calories craved in a way that promotes overall good health and may even help improve cholesterol numbers. Perhaps we are one step closer to proving that an apple a day really does keep the doctor away.

Stebbins man dies in snowmachine crash

A young Stebbins man died after his snowmachine reportedly struck a raised piece of sea ice April 16.

According to the Alaska State Troopers, Allen Atchak Jr., 19, was involved in the snowmachine accident on the sea ice near St. Michael at approximately 11 p.m. on April 16. He was evacuated to Nome where, according to a Trooper report, medical intervention failed April 17.

The report said Atchak was traveling southwest on the ice when he was thrown from the machine, receiving internal injuries. Troopers said alcohol was a contributing factor in the incident.

Trooper Beat

On April 2, the Alaska State Troopers received a third party report of a possible sexual abuse of a minor incident. AST has been attempting to contact the reported victim and has been unable to do so. Investigation is ongoing.

On April 15, at about 3:00 p.m., Nome AST re ceived a report from Stebbins that Kellen Katcheak was outside the school with a gun and was threatening to kill himself. TALKING IT THROUGH (above)—Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium Tribal Doctor, and former Nomeite, Rita Blumenstein speaks to a community gathering in Brevig Mission April 22 about the importance of taking the time to listen to children. "They need help. They need love," she said.

Brevig Mission conference hopes to break the silence

By Tyler Rhodes

BREVIG MISSION—As Barbara Franks rose from the bleachers in the Brevig Mission gym to face the crowd, young mothers reined in their toddlers by their shirts, grandfathers cooed at their infant grandchildren and teenagers giggled as they passed back and forth their cell phones.

In that room where the community's love for its children was palpable and on display, Franks stood up and gave words to the unimaginable for parents. "My youngest son was 23 when he completed his suicide," she said.

The adults in the gym grew silent. Franks' loss rang all too familiar in the village where a number of its own had taken their own lives in the past year.

But Franks' visit and talk was not about reliving or dwelling on any shared pain. The Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium's suicide prevention program coordinator and her companions were in town, rather, to help the community move forward from the loss experienced over the last year and start giving residents the tools to help prevent future suicides.

On the invitation of village elders, the visiting group came to participate in a two-day event that was dubbed the "Journey to Wellness Conference." Organized by Emma Olanna, Brevig Mission's village-based counselor, the conference featured personnel from the Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium and Norton Sound Health Corp. "We need that support in regard to this issue," Olanna said.

Franks was joined by the tribal health consortium's behavioral health director, Kathleen Graves, and tribal doctor Rita Blumenstein. In addition to the ANTHC crew, Jones Wongittilin, Norton Sound Health Corp.'s chemical dependency counselor and suicide prevention coordinator, and Renee Brown, an itinerate behavioral health clinician, also came to Brevig Mission for the conference.

During their stay, the guests spent much of their time talking, describing the signs that may indicate a person is considering suicide, offering advice on what to do if a friend or loved one appears suicidal and describing their own experience with the issue, whether they had lost a loved one or had considered it themselves. The guests also nudged the residents to speak up themselves. "We have to learn to speak to each other, we can't keep stuffing it," Wongittilin said during his presentation at the community meeting held in the gym April 22.

That this western Seward Peninsula community, and others around the state, are having the discussion at all is encouraging to the prevention experts. For many years—and still in many places in Alaska—the mere mention of suicide was taboo. "People are not so stigmatized anymore. People are thinking it's OK to seek help or OK to seek a clinician," she said. "Before, everything was kept quiet. This generation is learning to talk about their feelings."

It appeared Brevig Mission was ready to listen. At a community dinner and meeting, at least a third of the village's population of 350 turned out to eat and listen.

While the Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium personnel have traveled throughout the state to either discuss suicide prevention or train village residents in prevention efforts, they have not always been entirely welcomed into communities. Brevig Mission, however, was very welcoming, the team said. "It's really nice to be invited into the school here," Graves said.

While a crowd of approximately 100 filled the small bleachers in the school gym at the April 22 evening gathering, most of the visiting group's time was spent in the school with just the students present. In their first meeting, the teenagers were invited to share their feelings and questions with the guests in anonymous written form.

keep. "It's serious. You need to tell someone," Wongittilin told the students. "It's never wrong to ask, 'Are you trying to kill yourself?"" Franks echoed that thought.

Franks echoed that thought. "You're letting that person know that you are so special to me, that I want you to get some help," she said. "This is your community, you need to take care of each other."

friend's suicidal talk is no secret to

For Franks, speaking about her son's death became a path toward healing for herself. She told the community and students of seeing her friends and acquaintances slip into a store or cross munity who can provide support for their fellow residents having trouble. "My biggest concern after two days in your community is that Barb and I are leaving," Franks said. "We've opened this up, and people ask, 'Now what?' It's not fair for us to open this up if those people are not there for you."

The group said several community members have stepped forward to say they will be available when a fellow resident needs to talk. Brevig Mission School principal Robin Gray was among those who said her door is always open. In addition to making herself available, she also prodded her students to come to the April 22 community meeting, promising extra gym time for those who showed. She acknowledged that she was bribing the students, but told them she had their best interests at heart in doing so. "If one thing I've done helps you make a good decision, then I have done my job," Gray told her students.

In addition to the community members, Norton Sound Health Corp.'s Wongittilin and Brown said they are a resource that can be called on. "I like coming to Brevig. People are friendly here," Wongittilin said. "You've got a good community here."

"This is your community, you need to take care of each other."

- Barbara Franks, ANTHC Suicide Prevention Coordinator

They were later invited to a talking circle where they could voice their concerns out loud in a safe environment.

A recurring theme in the delegation's message was to simply listen to each other to provide support to their fellow community members. When residents felt they needed that support themselves, the guests stressed having a list of people to go to when those darkest of thoughts begin to overwhelm. "We need three to five people who we can talk to," Graves told the students during a gathering on the afternoon of April 22.

The guests also stressed that a to the other side of the street in Juneau shortly after her son's suicide. She said she later realized those people were avoiding her not because they thought poorly of her, but because they simply didn't know what to say. She said having someone to simply listen would have helped ease her pain. "No one even wanted to come up to talk to me," she said. "They didn't have to know what to say. They didn't even have to say anything."

Much of the group's effort in Brevig Mission was to identify and help nurture a lineup of people in the com-

School budget gets green light

Assistant principal position retained

By Tyler Rhodes

After weeks of meetings, many of them filled with discord, the Nome Board of Education passed its $11.1 million budget without revision at a special meeting April 27.

Three of the four board members present at the meeting cast a yes vote for the budget which includes funding for an assistant principal position at the junior/senior high school, an item that had essentially become the center of the budget debate. The dissenting vote was cast by Albert McComas, whose position on the assistant principal position has been well known throughout the budget debate. During a short work session before the special meeting was called to order, McComas previewed his vote, saying he felt the budget was based on too many rosy assumptions. "I don't support [the budget], and I don't support the [assistant principal] position," McComas said. You can call it a balanced budget, but we're still in [teacher salary] negotiations. It's a balanced budget

Discussion over the assistant principal job centered around whether a position requiring fewer credentials-and, thus, potentially less pay-could accomplish the job. The alternative being discussed was a dean of students, a job that could be filled by an employee with a teaching certificate versus the administrator's certificate needed by principals and assistant principals.

The prospect of cutting the assistant principal position in favor of a dean of students spurred a vocal group of teachers, parents and community members to approach the board each meeting to ask that the job be retained. While the issue was framed around the idea of saving funds, a breakdown of potential cost savings by the change was not requested by the board until the meeting before the final vote. The district crunched numbers for the April 27 meeting that considered three scenarios, which showed a savings of about $10,000 at one extreme and a loss of

NSEDC's partner opts out of Bering Sea cod fishery

By Laurie McNicholas

Glacier Fish Co. has decided to get out of cod fishing, John Eckels told the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. at their board of directors meeting April 28 in Unalakleet.

Eckels said the catcher/processor vessels Norton Sound and Glacier Bay, both of which are operated by GFC, have been fishing cod, but not with much success.

Eckels is president and chief executive officer of Siu Alaska Corp., NSEDC's wholly owned, for-profit subsidiary. NSEDC has endowed Siu with vessels and profit-making businesses, including the parent company's 37.5 percent ownership interest in GFC.

In e-mail replies to questions from The Nome Nugget following the board meeting, Eckels said the Norton Sound's Limited License Program fishing rights in the Bering Sea/Aleutian Islands Pacific cod fishery will be sold under a federal buyback program. "Assuming the buyback is completed, vessel ownership is retained, the LLP is retired," Eckels explained. "No existing cod allocations will be affected by the program." He estimated that Siu may net about $3 million as its share of proceeds from the sale.

Siu and GFC each own 50 percent of the Glacier Bay. Eckels said Siu will buy GFC's 50 percent interest in the Glacier Bay's LLP plans to detail Thursday evening just what has been going on at the Rock Creek Mine for the past year.

As for the future of the nearly constructed, but idled mine site just northwest of Nome, CEO Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse said there will be few details to give. "I'm sure there will be a lot of questions about going forward," he said Tuesday morning. "We'll certainly talk about our plans. We're looking toward making a decision sometime in the fall as to what will happen.'

A rumor has floated about Nome that NovaGold has decided to dismantle the facilities at the Rock Creek site. Van Nieuwenhuyse said Wednesday morning that there was no basis to the rumor and that the company is still actively discussing the mine's future. "Categorically I'll say no decision has been made on that order," he said. "We're planning together now. We'll announce what

Dear Editor,

There is an epidemic growing through our schools, employment and cyberspace as we speak. It is growing by leaps and bounds because it is not confronted and there are no laws presently to stop this epidemic. The epidemic we are encountering is the mistreatment, which impacts us with extreme psychological violence and can be labeled as bullying. psychological violence/bullying come in many forms at work, school or cyberspace. The victim or the target of bullying can be anyone of you wherever you may be.

Bullying usually starts as a "one

Take Care of Mama

She's our mother. She nurtures us, she feeds us, she provides shelter, she is formidable and can be unforgiving. She is our home planet. We call her Mother Nature, Mother Earth and this week is Mother's Day. How do we treat our Mother Earth? Some of us treat her with love and respect, others with insult and disrespect. We got a 911 wake up call several days go with an oil well disaster in the Gulf of Mexico. This spill promises to be much bigger than the Exxon Valdez disaster in Prince William Sound. It's the worst spill in US history. It will kill marine life, destroy fisheries, poison the waters, wipe out the economy and pollute our southern coastline from Texas to Florida. The entire Gulf of Mexico and much of the Caribbean Sea are impacted.

We reap what we sow. We have systematically removed the teeth from environmental protection laws. State government resource and permitting agencies crawl in bed with big business. Local governments go blind to safety and environmental violations and citizens go mute in the name of jobs. We have nitwits like Sarah Palin with her "Drill baby, drill" mantra and the attitude that man can not possibly overpower nature and that God will ensure that the earth remains fine no matter what humans do to the planet. We Alaskans should know about the fragile nature of the land and the sea and what happened when metal bursts and oil spews. We can feel for the loss that will impact our Gulf states. It only takes one mistake. One well disaster can cause immeasurable destruction. We need to rethink and reassess our attitude about responsible stewardship for our Mother Earth. We cannot allow ourselves to trust that industry will always do the right thing. They are interested in the bottom line, and we must never forget that fact.

We have major decisions to make here in our home state. Hard rock mining uses cyanide. Do we trust the mining industry to never, not even once, to have a big cyanide kill? Why should we? Let's not forget the burst pipelines on the North Slope. What insurance do we have? Ask the West Virginia miners' widows what they think of mine safety enforcement. Ask the Prince William Sound fishermen how they have suffered. This Mother's Day we need to examine our resolve to do the right thing for Mother Earth. We need to stop acting like a bunch of big dummies, hungry for money and having no environmental conscience. The "Drill baby, drill" politicians need to experience the toe of the voters' boots. — N.L.M.—

Parnell announces run for Governor

Last Friday, Governor Sean Parnell announced his intent to run for Governor in this fall's primary elections. Parnell filed the declaration of candidacy paperwork with the Anchorage office of the Division of Elections last week. Parnell is filling the rest of Sarah Palin's term after she quit the job last summer. According to the unofficial primary elections list of the Alaska Division of Elections, Republicans Ralph Samuels, Gerald Heikes, Merica Hlatcu and Sam Little have also filed paperwork to join the race for Governor. Democrat Party candidates are Bob Poe and Hollis French. Also certified for the ballot is Donald Wright for the Alaska Independence Party.

Conoco gets help from State

On Monday, the state of Alaska requested to become part of an administrative appeal against the Army Corps of Engineers after they denied a permit to drill in the National Petroleum Reserve. ConocoPhillips is challenging the decision of a district engineer with the Corps denying the company's application for a permit for the ČD-5 Alpine Satellite Development, west of the Colville River Delta in NPR-A. At issue is ConocoPhillips' proposal for a vehicle and pipeline bridge across the Nigliq Channel of the Colville River, rather than the Corps' preferred alternative of horizontal directional drilling under the channel. The state, along with the Arctic Slope Regional Corporation, the North Slope Borough, Kuukpik Corporation, the Native Village of Nuiqsut and the City of Nuiqsut, supported the bridge proposal. The governor maintains that under the Corps' regulations, the opinions of the state, as a permitting agency with jurisdiction and as the property owner of the Nigliq Channel, are entitled to be respected.

AEA releases energy roadmap for Alaska

During a rural energy conference held at the University of Alaska in Fairbanks last week, the Alaska Energy Authority released an Energy Pathway document, meant to build on its 2005 state energy analysis. The "Alaska Energy Pathway" is a 46page document and is a guide for Alaskan communities to utilize local energy resources. It aims to outline what can be done now and in the next 15 years to achieve energy savciency and the production of local renewable energy.

The draft pathway document is on

The state follows the Governor's marching orders to crack down on the prosecution of sex offenders. Last month, a Fairbanks man was sentenced to serve 38 years in prison and another is likely facing 99 years. In Fairbanks Superior Court Gareth Demoski, 22, learned his fate on April 19 for committing seven different crimes, including two counts of sexual assault in the first degree and two counts in the second degree, involving conduct against two different victims, both of whom were intoxicated and asleep. Fairbanks Judge Randy Olsen concluded that Demoski lacked empathy for his victims and sentenced him to 58 and ahalf years in prison, with 20 years suspended and 15 years of probation.

Last Friday, a Kotzebue jury convicted James Phillips of 13 felonies, seven counts of which were sexual assaults in the second degree and sexual abuses of a minor in the third degree, involving four teenage girls on four separate occasions. Rick Svobodny, deputy attorney general for the criminal division of the Department of Law said that with tough new laws, and with Governor Parnell's commitment to ending the epidemic of sexual violence in Alaska within 10 years, the department put potential offenders on notice that if they commit these crimes they might well end up in prison for the rest of

Tony Knowles appointed to NPS advisory board

Secretary of the Interior Ken Salazar has appointed 12 new members, including former Alaska Governor Tony Knowles to the National Park System Advisory Board.

Eight of the new members previously served on the independent Second Century Commission that was charged with developing a 21st century vision for the National Park Service. In 2009 the commission submitted a comprehensive report that included sweeping recommendations for enhancing the ability of the National Park Service to share its natural heritage with all Americans and engage them in its protection.

Salazar said that the board is tasked to help address issues like the economy, climate change, connecting Americans to the great outdoors, obesity, and the loss of cultural literacy. The board's terms are four years. Knowles is the only Alaskan on the board.

Census goes door-to-door

Starting on Monday, the Census kicked off its door-to-door campaign to continue the 2010 population count. Some 1,300 enumerators are tasked to count people who didn't respond to the mailed census forms. There is a 70 percent mail response in Anchorage, but rural responses are slacking.

Millrock Resources explores at Bluff

On Friday, Millrock Resources Inc. announced the finalization of an Option to Joint Venture agreement with Valdez Gold Inc. to explore the Bluff gold prospect on the Seward Peninsula, almost 50 miles east of Nome.

Valdez Gold can earn an initial 55 percent interest in the Bluff project by spending $3 million in exploration, making option payments of US $300,000, and issuing 900,000 shares of Valdez to Millrock prior to December 31, 2012. In addition, Valdez can earn 20 percent for a total 75 percent interest by making additional exploration expenditures of $3 million, further option payments of $600,000, issuing 1.1 million additional shares of Valdez to Millrock over three years, and by meeting the obligations of lease agreements with Bering Straits Native Corporation and White Mountain Native Corporation.

The partners are now planning the 2010 exploration program to commence in June. Plans for the program include 5,500 yards of reverse circulation drilling designed to expand known mineralized zones and test other targets on the property. The mining company takes advantage of the state-maintained Nome-Council highway to access the property, still 11 miles off the road system. The Bluff property is owned by the Bering Straits Native Corporation and is leased to its subsidiary Golden Glacier Inc. Millrock has an option to earn a 100 percent leasehold interest in the lands from Golden Glacier.

In-state gas line legislation signed

Last week Gov. Sean Parnell signed legislation intended to bring an in-state gas pipeline and affordable natural gas to cities and communities along the rail belt. Parnell signed HB 369 on April 26 at the Pipeline Training Center in Fairbanks. The bill creates a development team headed by the chief executive of the Alaska Housing Finance Corp. The team is charged to draw up a project plan and submit it to lawmakers by July 2011 with an operational pipeline in place by 2016.

During a townhall meeting in the railbelt community of Trapper Creek last Saturday, Rep. Mark Neuman (R-Wasilla) said that the in-state gasline legislation had been a high priority during the last legislative session. He added the gas line could benefit resource development in rural areas. He suggested to build a spur of the pipeline to Donlin Creek, where the NovaGold Resources Inc. and Barrick Gold in a joint venture propose to build a large gold mine.

Denali Commission funding discussed

Continued funding for the Denali Commission has been discussed on Capitol Hill last Thursday. It was the topic of a hearing at a U.S. House Transportation subcommittee on Economic Development, Public Buildings and Emergency Management. After testimony and pleas for continued funding from Denali Commission federal co-chair Joel Neimeyer and Congressman Don Young, the committee's chairwoman Eleanor Holmes-Norton, a Washington D.C. Democrat, asked for field hearings to be held in Alaska. The locations or dates of the hearings have not been set yet. This year, the Alaska delegation asked for $42 million in appropriated funds from the federal budget to fund the Denali Commission. Through a transportation and highway infrastructure bill passed last year, the Denali Commission will continue to receive $20 million per year for transportation projects.

Funding has crashed from $140 million in 2006 to $15.9 million for 2011. The next budget for all regional economic commissions in the US allocates only $106 million.

$3,000 at the other end if a dean were hired instead of an assistant principal.

Voting yes for the budget were Board President Gloria Karmun, Barb Nickels and Kirsten Timbers. Board member Heather Payenna was excused from the meeting as she was out of town.

Nickels has been vocal and steadfast in her support of the budget and assistant principal position, and Karmun voiced her support for the assistant principal position at an April 13 meeting. "I fully support [Superintendent] Jon Wehde and the budget he presented," Karmun said April 27. She added that she felt supporting the position was particularly important since the district had been advertising for the job for a couple of months.

Whether or not the position would survive the board's April 27 vote was unknown as neither Timbers nor Payenna gave any public indication on how they would vote prior to the decisive meeting. It was Timbers who had first broached the assistant principal position discussion to see if any savings could be realized by hiring a dean of students instead. "Seeing as we don't have a budget shortfall, I don't see the need for a drop-down to a dean," Timbers said before the April 27 vote. "If we face shortfalls in the future, we should revisit this subject."

The budget is by no means set in stone, and the potential exists for Timbers and her cohorts to revisit the issue sooner than later. Like McComas cited, salary negotiations between teachers and the district are ongoing. The approved budget is based on the district's last, best offer to the teachers, essentially a raise of 1.2 percent each year for the next two years. In two rounds of negotiations before the process went to arbitration, the teachers' union held firm on its request for a 7 percent raise to be realized over two years.

The difference between the teachers' request and the district's offer is significant. If the teachers were to have their request fully granted, depending on how the 7 percent was split over the two years, the district calculated a cost of anywhere between $292,000 and $558,000 to fund the raises. The district figured it would cost roughly $160,000 to implement its last, best offer.

Also unknown is just how much the district will receive from the city and state. Now that the school board has given the budget its blessing, Superintendent Jon Wehde will next go before the Nome Common Council to request additional city funds be appropriated for the district.

By state statute, the city is required to fund the schools at a certain level—an amount that totals just more than $1 million for this budget. The approved budget counts on the city chipping in an additional $792,000 on top of the required amount. That would mark an increase of $67,000 over what the city chipped in last year in excess of state-required funding.

As for the state, its final allocation for the district is not known each year until October when districts across the state give their official student count. The state bases its funding for each district on the number of students enrolled. While Nome Public Schools accurately predicted its student count last year, the October count two years ago came up shockingly short of what the district predicted the previous spring. The result was cut positions and programs as the district had to whittle down the budget to account for the precipitous drop in state funding.

This year's predicted student count mirrors last year's, prompting the district to estimate that the state will contribute nearly $7.7 million.

Vote spurs requests to reinstate Boyer

The debate over the budget and the assistant principal position over the past couple of months has been entwined with public anger over the district's decision to not rehire the man who now holds the job. At its Jan. 12 meeting, the board voted to not renew the contracts for Nome-Beltz Principal Janeen Sullivan and Assistant Principal Doug Boyer.

Saying it was a confidential personnel decision, the board has never offered any rationale for the split vote regarding the administrators who had previously been given satisfactory reviews by Superintendent Wehde. The move spurred a vocal segment of the public to initiate the recall process against four of the five school board members. A separate petition was later filed for the remaining member, Nickels. The recall vote for the entire board is slated for May 25.

The board's April 27 meeting again saw a public plea that at least one of the administrators be returned to the job. "If the budget is approved with the assistant principal position in tact, I would encourage you at the first opportunity to rescind your decision for not renewing Doug Boyer's contract," parent Julie Kelso said. She said that budget concerns were the only reasons given for not retaining Boyer and argued that those reasons would be no longer valid if the position were maintained in the approved budget.

Board member Nickels announced before the budget vote that if the assistant principal position were maintained she would introduce a motion at the next meeting to rescind the vote that denied Boyer a contract for next year. She said she would then introduce a motion to again offer him his job. Nickels, however, has had little success in getting many of her motions seconded at recent board meetings.

Hello Central, goodbye freezer

The budget did see one change from its first presentation to the board and its final approval April 27. The sole tweak came to the Community Schools program, which manages the elementary school for uses outside the school day.

The program's current director, Richard Beneville, saw his hours cut from 37.5 hours a week to 30 hours after the budget took the hit from the unexpectedly low student count two years ago. The initial version of this year's budget brought the position back under the district's general fund, but kept it at 30 hours a week. At Nickels' and Karmun's request the Community Schools' hours were put back at the full-time 37.5 hours.

The additional hours required $12,500 be offset somewhere else in the budget. "It does eliminate the freezer we had intended to put here in the elementary school," said district business manager Jenny Martens. She added that the freezer still may be a possibility if cost savings pan out at the end of the school year.

that plan is in fall."

Van Nieuwenhuyse said NovaGold's contribution to the meeting, slated for 5 p.m. on May 6 at the Mini Convention Center, will largely be dedicated to describing the company's efforts to bolster its plan and infrastructure for dealing with storm water. He said Nome's John Odden will give most of the presentation.

He also said company officials will discuss the work done to remove water from behind its tailings dam, a structure that was never intended to hold back the large volume of water that had accumulated behind it. In the past year, NovaGold has brought a plant online to treat the water before it was pumped back underground by a series of injection wells.

Van Nieuwenhuyse said the efforts to deal with Rock Creek's water woes have been fruitful over the past year. "Now there is no significant water behind the tailings storage facility," he said. "It's been a very successful year. We want to go through all the steps [at the meeting], water injection, how that works."

Since it halted work at the site in November 2008, NovaGold's work at Rock Creek has centered on dealing with storm water and the tailings storage facility, as well as maintaining the facilities that were intended to produce gold. The company has continually stated that it has been examining options for the mine site, including a sale or resumption of operations, but no plan has been forthcoming in the year and a half since construction stopped.

NovaGold faces a November deadline with the State of Alaska under its certificate for operating the dam. The Department of Natural Resources requires NovaGold to notify it of the company's preliminary and future intentions at the mine site by Nov. 1.

Officials from the state departments of Natural Resources and Environmental Conservation should also be present at the Nome meeting this Thursday. The annual meeting is a requirement under the company's state permits. NSEDC to pay $140-$280 per ton for herring sac roe

By Laurie McNicholas

The prices that Norton Sound herring sac roe fishers receive for their catches this spring will range from $140 to $280 per ton, depending on the percent of roe recovery, the Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. board of directors decided at a meeting April 28 in Unalakleet.

NSEDC will pay $140 per ton for 7 percent roe recovery, the minimum accepted for the roe market. The price will increase by $20 per ton for each 1 percent increase in roe recovery up to $280 a ton for 14 percent recovery. The average roe recovery is 9 percent, which will fetch $180 per ton. Any herring deliveries with less than 7 percent roe recovery will be directed to the herring bait fishery. NSEDC will pay 75 cents per ton for bait herring.

The herring sac roe fishery quota is more than 8,000 tons, reported Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. NSEDC has set a harvest target of 1,000 tons for the Norton Sound fishery. The company has arranged with Icicle Seafoods to send one processor and four tenders to the region to buy product from fishermen.

ADF&G will maintain a test fish camp for herring at Cape Denbigh this year, Menard reported. The agency uses sea surface temperature modeling to project starting dates for the fishery at Togiak, which opens about three weeks earlier than the Norton Sound herring fishery. Menard estimated that the Norton Sound fishery could open by the end of the second week in June. He said ADF&G will open the fishery when the buyer and harvesters are ready and the tides are right and let the industry decide how to prosecute the fishery.

The Southern Norton Sound Seafood Products processing plant at Unalakleet is gearing up for the herring season, reports manager William (Middy) Johnson. NSEDC has asked herring fishers to contact Johnson to order gear. Johnson said he will hold fishermen's meetings in Norton Sound villages May 10-12 to discuss the upcoming herring and salmon seasons.

Commercial king crab fishery

Menard said ADF&G conducted a winter test fishery for Norton Sound red king crab and is updating its model. An ADF&G scientist recently told him the model indicates a biomass of 4.45 million pounds of legal male crabs in the sound, he added.

The catch quota for the 2010 commercial red king crab fishery in Norton Sound has not yet been determined, but Menard's guess is that it will range from 350,000 to 400,000 pounds. The fishery can start June 15, but there is a significant amount of ice this year far out in the sound, so Menard's guess is that it will open later in June.

Prices for Norton Sound red king crab are being negotiated with potential buyers, reported Rich Ferry, manager of the Northern Norton Sound Seafood Products processing plant in Nome. He expects that a contract will be arranged by the end of May.

Nome fisherman Frank McFarland asked the NSEDC board to fund repairs costs for an old boat trailer for fishers to use this year. He pointed out that a newer and larger boat trailer purchased two years ago was damaged in an accident last year, has not been repaired and is tied up in insurance claims. The board agreed to fund a maximum of $10,000 in repairs for the old Nome trailer, up to $5,000 to repair a boat trailer owned by the City of Unalakleet and used by Unalakleet fishermen, and $1,000 to repair a boat trailer in Golovin.

Salmon fishing outlook

Ocean survival indices for chum salmon indicate a good run through most of Norton Sound this year, reported Scott Kent, assistant manager for ADF&G's Arctic region.

Kent said the pink salmon run in southern Norton Sound is likely to be stronger than in 2008, a below-average, even-numbered year run. "Conversely, pink salmon runs in northern Norton Sound may be less than what occurred in 2008," Kent wrote in an e-mail to The Nome Nugget. "However, pink salmon runs throughout Norton Sound should easily provide for commercial fishing and subsistence needs. A new regulation adopted by the Board of Fisheries will allow commercial fishing for pink salmon to open as early as July 6 in the Moses Point and Golovin areas, fishing rights for cod. "At this point in time, Siu has only decided to purchase the Glacier Bay's LLP; no decision has been made by the owners (GFC and Siu) as to disposition of the vessel itself," Eckels wrote.

During the April 28 NSEDC board meeting, Eckels said the Aleutian No. I harvested 135,000 pounds of Western Aleutian Islands golden king crab in its first trip, far more than the anticipated catch of 80,000 pounds. He said the vessel is expected to complete another good golden king crab harvest in the region before the season ends on May 15. Prices for golden king crab are strengthening as Russian crab deliveries drop, he added.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration chartered the Pacific Star for a 100-day survey in the Aleutian Islands area to begin May 15, Eckels reported. He said the charter may extend to 150 days, and the rate Siu charged increased 10 percent this year. Repairs to the vessel cost $130,000, he added.

Pollock roe prices decreased by 30 percent this year compared to 2009, and they were down 20 percent in 2009 compared to 2008, Eckels noted. He said Russia has produced a lot of pollock roe. "Meat [pollock fillet] prices are holding up well," he added.

NSEDC's net assets totaled $140.3 million on March 31, a net gain of $4.1 million in the first quarter of this year, reported Controller Rick Walicki. He said profits from securities investments totaled $1.9 million in the first quarter of 2010, compared to losses of $2.7 million in the first quarter of last year. The value of NSEDC's investment portfolio stood at $67.1 million on March 31, compared to about $56 million on Dec. 31, 2008, Walicki said.

Outside entity funding

The NSEDC board approved a number of projects for funding under the company's 2010 Outside Entity Funding Program for non-fisheries related proposals. Janis Ivanoff, NSEDC's chief executive officer, said the company allocated $60,000 for each community, and some communities did not recommend using their entire allocation, so the unused portion will be rolled over to 2011. Gambell and Stebbins did not submit applications for funding, so their entire allocations will be rolled over to 2011, she added. Following is a list of the approved community projects.

Bering Straits Foundation, Imangmiut King Island Dancers; Brevig Mission School, open gym coordinators; Chinik Eskimo Community, cultural revival; City of Brevig Mission, public facilities upgrade/repair and old clinic remodel; City of Elim, front end loader purchase; City of Koyuk, fishermen's floating dock, and solar powered repeater station; City of Savoonga, steel garage; City of Shaktoolik, washeteria upgrade; City of St. Michael, welding shop; City of Teller, HBT service and Teller emergency service vehicle, and garage door and repairs: City of Wales, welder-generator equipment; City of White Mountain, loader purchase; Mary's Igloo Traditional Council, search and rescue snow machine, cultural education, "Preserving our Past" Elder and youth cultural camp and shelter cabin; Native Village of Diomede, Tribal Elder Assistance Program and whaling equipment and supply upgrade project; Native Village of Elim, Tubuktulik watershed project; Native Village of Koyuk, burn box construction and completion of Koyuk IRA building; Native Village of Teller, community use generator; Native Village of Unalakleet, Elder nutrition and services; Native Village of Wales, Kingimiut Dance Festival; Nomad Charities and Nomad Films, The Island In Between, film production of Savoonga whaling.

The NSEDC board reviewed two applications for regional projects under the Outside Entity Funding program—a proposal from Kawerak Inc. for $150,000 for a nursing degree program; and a proposal from the Nome Native Arts Center for $198,000 for website development. Janis Ivanoff noted that Outside Entity Funding for a regional project is capped at $100,000.

Paul Ivanoff, community benefits director, said the Kawerak proposal would fully fund four students who are currently enrolled in a nursing program until they graduate in two years. No board member expressed support for the Kawerak proposal.

Board member Don Stiles of Nome said the Nome Native Arts Center proposal initially was referred to the Nome selection committee as a Nome project, but the organization works with artists throughout the region. NSEDC provided the center with $10,000 in startup funds and it has opened a store in Nome, he 'We tried to find where website development would take place in this budget," Stiles said of the NNAC proposal. The committee felt that budget requests for inventory, village meetings and board meetings do not relate to website development, Roy Ashenfelter, community development coordinator for NSEDC, said the budget for the NNAC proposal lacked data about the website, and until data is available showing how the website will work, the committee chose not to fund the proposal.

Noting that NNAC had held meetings in Gambell, Savoonga, Teller and Brevig Mission, Dan Harrelson, NSEDC's board chairman and president, asked board members from the four communities for their impressions. Joel James of Gambell and Truman Kava of Savoonga said they did not attended the NNAC meetings. Reggie Barr said he had attended the Brevig Mission meeting and NNAC is okay.

and NNAC is okay.

Joe Garnie said he had attended part of the NNAC meeting in Teller and was surprised at the turnout. "A lot of people do bone, ivory, wood work and skin sewing and are interested in the program," he said. He recalled a past effort to create a Native arts and crafts cooperative under state management that fizzled. Garnie said he thinks an art store in Nome is a good thing that will bring more money to communities.

"I like the art center idea," he said.
"I've sold to shops in Nome and I've been to the new place." He said the NNAC store has a good atmosphere, will take products on consignment and treats artists with dignity.

Harrelson asked if there is any support for granting $100,000 to the NNAC.

"Yes," Garnie replied.

Harrelson suggested telling NNAC that $100,000 is available and asking how it will be used.

Stiles said he wants to see a budget specifically for website development, not how $100,000 will be used.

Paul Ivanoff said the title of the NNAC proposal is "Website Development."

The board approved a motion by Dean Peterson of Golovin, seconded by Barr, to accept the NNAC application and comment on the funding amount when the board receives website budget costs from the organization.

Other board actions

Stiles moved, seconded by Harvey Sookiayak of Shaktoolik, to begin the evaluation process for the chief executive officer, utilizing a 360-degree evaluation process and having our legal counsel begin an investigation into that and actually hiring an outside firm to conduct that process. The motion passed.

Harrelson provided the exact wording of the Stiles' motion by email at the request of The Nome Nugget and added these comments: "The NSEDC board has the utmost confidence in Janis [Ivanoff] and is very pleased with her performance to-date; however, the board feels that it is important to have a full, impartial evaluation done for the CEO position on an annual basis. This year, the evaluation is scheduled for July. The motion is intended to initiate the gathering of input for this annual task, which is considered to be 'best practice' by many organizations."

The NSEDC board elected Oscar Takak of Elim as chair of the Norton Sound Seafood Products working group, succeeding Garnie. Takak also chairs the fisheries development committee, a standing committee, unlike the NSSP working group.

Jerry Ivanoff, NSEDC's education, employment and training coordinator, thanked the board for increasing scholarship funding by $50,000 to a total of $650,000 this year.

Topics discussed by the full board during a two-hour executive session included a Siu Alaska Corp. report, a Pilgrim Hot Springs update, an Education Foundation update, an update on a lawsuit in regard to the October 2009 election for the Nome board seat, and the prices that NSEDC will pay fishermen for herring sac roe. (See a related story above for information on herring sac roe prices.)

The quarterly meeting was scheduled April 26-29, but the board completed the agenda April 28. Board members Orville Ahkinga of Little Diomede and Wilfred Katcheak of Stebbins were absent and excused from the meeting.

Harrelson said the board's next quarterly meeting will take place in July in Nome.

Floating weir for Unalakleet River king salmon study takes shape

By Laurie McNicholas

Rob Stewart heads a crew of four men who are building a floating salmon weir that will span a 300-foot wide stretch of the Unalakleet River beginning this summer.

Last week he showed visitors how the weir is being assembled at the Marine Support Center in Unalakleet and described its functions. Stewart is a fish and wildlife technician for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game who has built a half-dozen floating weirs in Alaska.

The Office of Subsistence Management of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has granted $620,931 to ADF&G and the Native Village of Unalakleet for a four-year project to install and operate the weir. The project aims to obtain reliable estimates of the abundance and age, sex and length composition of Chinook (king) salmon spawning escapement on the Unalakleet River.

A decline in abundance of the river's king salmon in recent years has resulted in the collapse of the commercial king salmon fishery and a decline in subsistence harvests. Scott Kent, assistant manager of ADF&G's Arctic region, is principal investigator for the project.

Stewart said 100 panels of tubular polyvinyl chloride pipe will be placed side by side across the river. Each panel is 20 feet long and 3 feet wide with a resistance board at one end. "The panel will be six feet high at one end," Stewart said. "The resistance board at the high end creates a buoyancy effect." The opposite end of each panel has hooks to attach it to a steel rail anchored to the streambed across the width of the river, forming a fish barrier.

An apron of polyethylene mesh will be laid on the streambed beneath the weir. "The substrate apron on the river bottom holds gravel in place and prevents salmon from escaping underneath the weir," Stewart said.

Stewart said two gates (fish chutes) will funnel salmon through the weir so they can be counted visually by a technician who is standing on the weir. "There will be a live trap at the weir to capture salmon and sample them for age, sex and length data," he said.

A skiff gate will be installed on a portion of the weir. "Most river boats will be able to drive over the weir without assistance," Stewart said. "Larger, propeller-driven boats will require assistance to pull the boats over the weir. The weir will be staffed 24 hours a day."

Stewart said the operational advantages of a floating weir include flood resistance. "It's free to float, so you can sink it and push a tree over it," he said. "In the fall, debris and dead pink salmon wind up on the weir. You get a heavy guy to walk on it and the current pushes them off the weir." When heavy pink salmon runs put pressure on the weir, a section of it can be opened to let them through, he added.

Last week Stewart estimated that construction of all 100 weir panels will be completed in six weeks. "They will be put in boats and skiffs, and hauled upriver," he said. "It will take about a week to install the weir. We're shooting for June 20." Stewart wrote an ADF&G manual titled Techniques for Installing a Resistance Board Fish Weir in 2003. He also designed and built the Pilgrim River fish weir. He will return to his station in Aniak after completing construction of the Unalakleet River weir.

ADF&G biologist Larry Neff, who is helping to build the weir, will supervise its installation and operation. Unalakleet residents Brian Johnson and Christian Johnson are employed as Native Village of Unalakleet fishery technicians to construct the weir. NVU technicians will also be hired to install and operate the weir.

Funds to supplement the federal grant for the Unalakleet weir project are provided by ADF&G ($53,952), the Bureau of land Management ($15,364), and Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. ($15,364).

King salmon data collected at the weir will supplement information from a two-year ADF&G radio telemetry study of Unalakleet River kings that began last summer, and annual estimates of king salmon passage from a counting tower on the North River, a Unalakleet River tributary.

even if ADF&G projects that the chum salmon escapement goal will not be reached."

In the Port Clarence district, subsistence fishing should be good except for sockeye salmon, Kent said. Last year's sockeye salmon run was extremely weak in the district.

Kent said 2006 was a banner year for Norton Sound coho salmon and runs have been plentiful for several years, but this year could be different depending on food availability and ocean conditions. "Large coho salmon escapements occurred throughout Norton Sound in 2006," he noted. "Sometimes you don't get good returns from large escapements."

A decline in abundance of the Unalakleet River's king salmon fishery in recent years has resulted in the collapse of the commercial king salmon fishery and a decline in subsistence harvests. Kent said a federally funded study of salmon spawning escapement on the river will begin this summer with installation of a floating weir about 14 miles upriver from Unalakleet. (See story above.)

Middy Johnson said he has not yet nailed down prices for salmon products with Copper River Seafoods. He said the company buys most of the Unalakleet plant's coho salmon headed and gutted for the fresh market. During the NSEDC board meeting last week in Unalakleet, Johnson displayed a Copper River Seafoods brochure depicting products ranging from fresh salmon to salmon jerky for pets.

Johnson said the price of materials for a new 30-by-50-foot storage shed for the Unalakleet plant will be $32,500 plus shipping, so the total cost will be well under the $200,000 NSEDC budgeted for the structure.

Boats for villages

Charlie Lean, NSEDC's director of fisheries research and development, said he has ordered four 20-foot Lund boats, one each for Brevig Mission, Little Diomede, Teller and Wales. He also has ordered 80-horsepower motors for the boats that will go to Brevig Mission and Teller and 40-horsepower motors for the Little Diomede and Wales boats. The boats are expected to arrive by tender in mid-July, depending on ice conditions, he added. Lean said he will need to determine who will manage the boat NSEDC provides in each of the four villages.

Planners approve Steadman St. site for state building

Nome Common Council still has say

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission has examined a preliminary plat from Alaska Gold Co. and, lo, found it good.

The panel unanimously OK'd a proposed site, Nugget Subdivision, for the new state building at the north end of Steadman Street at its May 4 meeting following a public hearing on the issue. This means the proposed land use, as mapped, meets the codes in place with which to evaluate a project site, with required fees paid to the City of Nome. Such approval does not mean the group takes a position on the location of the building, NPC president Tom Sparks said. They approve plats within the scope of their power.

"We can approve it, disapprove it, postpone approval or approve with conditions," he said. The NPC spent a couple of years on zoning, and now has to follow those rules, he noted. "We have due process and regula-

Nomeites hoping to hear what lies in store for the idled Rock Creek Mine just outside of town likely left disappointed from NovaGold's annual mine update May 6 at the Mini Convention Center.

Despite several questions from area residents as to what's on the horizon, officials with NovaGold were tightlipped on any leanings the mine owner and operator may harbor for Rock Creek. NovaGold could only offer the same line that's been heard for months, a plan is in the works. "Nome's an expensive place to do business," Chief Executive Officer Rick Van Nieuwenhuyse said. "We've got a good gold price, so hopefully we can put something together that works."

School budget looks to pass muster with common council

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome Public Schools Superintendent Jon Wehde seemed a bit stunned after the Nome Common Council went through his budget for the next school year in fewer than 15 minutes Monday evening.

While Wehde appeared ready to defend at length his request that the city chip in nearly $800,000 above and beyond the $1 million contribution required by the state, brevity was the order of the evening. "I watched Stan and Amy [Lujan] go through this and you had a lot more questions for them," Wehde said of the district's former superintendent and business manager as the room began to clear.

"You go back, and they were asking for a lot more money, a lot more,"

Councilman Stan Andersen replied.
The short back-and-forth came during a council work session designed to allow its members to examine the school district's budget and pose questions to Wehde and his team. A regular council meeting that had been scheduled for after the work session had been canceled due to a lack of agenda items.

The few questions Wehde did have to answer from Mayor Denise Michels and the council mostly concerned how the budget would support the district's schools making the grade when it comes to meeting state testing standards. Wehde pointed to the inclusion of a new administrator in the budget, titled a coordinator of curriculum and assessment, which he said would guide and support teachers in efforts to have the district's schools make what is dubbed "adequate yearly progress" in the eyes of the state. "I need this coordinator position in the budget more than I would be willing to say I need another teacher on the line," Wehde said. "You're looking at your new

Wehde described the budget as an effort to rebuild the district's staffing

Academic Freedom at the University of Alaska: R.I.P.

By Susan B. Andrews and John Creed

KOTZEBUE-University of Alaska president Mark Hamilton is forbidding us, as UA professors, to write about Sarah Palin.

For that matter, we've been told that commentary about any political candidate, potential or actual, must be approved by a UA Statewide "ethics" attorney and the state attorney general (a political appointee) before we can share it with our UA colleagues.

This kind of censorship is called "prior restraint," a free speech and free press violation. It is also antithetical to the nature of a university, where the free exchange of ideas is a bedrock principle.

Mr. Hamilton's vaunted reputation as a champion of academic freedom is,

A retired Army general, Hamilton astounded many with a 2001 pronouncement on free speech, declaring that opinions by UA employees "need not be politic or polite." No matter how "personally offended" people might be, Hamilton asserted, or even how "unfair the association of the University to the opinion might be," free speech would rule at UA.

We believed Mr. Hamilton then.

We've published hundreds of pieces by our students and ourselves over the years, political commentary constituting but a small percentage. But even for that tiny fraction, Hamilton is applying a bizarre interpretation to a state ethics law that, ironically, exempts political commentary like ours rather than

As journalism academics, our intent has always been to expand democracy by informing citizens through reporting and commentary. We teach writing more effectively by regularly practicing our craft professionally. Universities work best that way.

Editorial

Spite and Grudge

Some folks like to carry a grudge. They even keep it in the family for generations. They hang on so long they forget the details of the grudge, but they know they have it. Then there are folks who would cut off their nose to spite their face. They are just plain mean and nasty, they are slash and burn politicians.

We have no room for spite and grudge in a democratic government. The spite and grudge mentality should not be part of the picture. It is the dominant factor in dictatorships and totalitarian forms of government. Somehow the Nome School Board does not understand this concept and confuses tyranny with democracy. They think that because they were elected to be on the board that they are above explaining their actions and don't have to comply with due process and the board's own policies.

Soon the board will have to answer to the public. Do the voters of Nome want to abide by the decisions of officials who don't have the courage to tell the public why they are acting like a bunch of silly little girls on a revenge rampage? We need board members to act in a mature, rational fashion and with devotion to open government. We do not need another Alice in Wonderland with a bunch of Red Queens. Vote "yes" for recall. Show the real meaning of democracy in action. —N.L.M.—

Foster's Report

CAPITAL BUDGET By Rep. Neal W. Foster

We met with the Governor last week regarding the Capital Budget. The Governor had indicated he may be looking at nearly $1 billion in line item vetoes. While he stopped short of declaring it as a sure thing, he did ask for a discretionary list totaling $500,000. These would be projects he would hold harmless in the veto process. The problem: $500,000 does not come close to meeting the needs of a large rural district. That's not just for our district but goes for Reggie Joule, Bob Herron, Woodie Salmon, etc. HD 39 has 28 communities. Senator Olson and I were able to secure funding for about half of these communities. With only a few exceptions each of these communities got one project. While every community has multiple needs and the districts' needs are nearly limitless, the funding available is finite. With the governor asking us to pick which projects (communities) to save, he's essentially asking us which ones should be left out.

I told the governor that infrastructure in rural Alaska is woefully inadequate. Railbelt communities already have equipment to keep their streets clear and their water and sewer systems functioning. They have facilities to operate law enforcement. These are the types of things we were able to fund through the legislative process. (We had tens of millions of dollars of requests that did not get funded.) Every project in the budget is my #1 priority for that community, and $500,000 is barely enough to fund projects in two or three communities. I will, as a courtesy, provide the governor with a list of projects added by the legislature but it will be a full list without an arbitrary cap. I am hopeful that Governor Parnell will see things the way I do in this matter.

The communities can help. Write letters to the governor's office supporting your projects. I mentioned this last week but cannot over stress its importance. Let him know how your project is crucial to the health and safety, infrastructure, and/or economy, of your communities. Address letters to:

Former Governor Wally Hickel

Prominent Alaskan, Governor and former Secretary of the Interior Wally Hickel died Friday morning at age 90 at the Horizon House, an Anchorage assisted living home. His family said he died of natural causes. Hickel served twice as Governor of Alaska and was Secretary of the Interior under the Nixon administration. Hickel was fired from the post after criticizing the president for ignoring young Americans' protests over the Vietnam War.

Mead Treadwell intends to run for Lt. Governor

The chair of the U-S Arctic Research Commission has announced his resignation from the commission to run for Lieutenant Governor in the upcoming primary election this summer. Mead Treadwell filed a letter of intent on Friday to run on the Republican ticket.

AP reports that in his resignation letter to President Barack Obama, Treadwell said he's frustrated by Washington's lack of a response to the commission's calls for action and funding to research oil spills and rural suicide. Other Republicans running for Lt. Governor are legislator Jay Ramras of Fairbanks and radio talk show host Eddie Burke of Anchorage. Democrats Diane Benson of Anchorage and Nome Mayor Denise Michels also filed their paperwork with APOC to join the race.

Bethel stays wet

In a third election concerning whether or not to allow alcohol in Bethel, 57 percent of voters opted to allow the importation and consumption of booze in the city. Law enforcement officials say that in some surrounding villages where all alcohol is forbidden, more black market liquor appears to be making its way to their communities.

DEC tackles cyanide spill at Fort Knox

FAIRBANKS (AP)— A two-acre area at the Fort Knox Gold Mine

move pollution from a spill of water contaminated with a low concentration of sodium cyanide. The Department of Environmental Conservation said that most of the estimated 305,000-gallon spill was contained within a building. But 30,000 to 35,000 gallons flowed onto a gravel road and parking lot within the site. The spill happened on Wednesday, May 5. The DEC said the spilled cyanide doesn't pose an inhalation hazard to workers cleaning the spill. Earthen barriers were set up to prevent the cyanide from migrating farther. Excavated contaminated soil will be hauled away by truck, the DEC said. The Fort Knox mine has been the state's largest gold producer from 1996 through 2007 and is owned by Kinross Gold Corp. of Toronto.

New offshore oil drilling approvals on hold

In the wake of the oil disaster in the Gulf of Mexico, Interior Secretary Ken Salazar announced that new approvals for offshore oil drilling would be halted for three weeks. A Washington Post expose alleges that the Minerals Management Service approved BP's drilling plan without any environmental review. The Department of Interior did not require any analysis or planning for a catastrophic spill because it declared the probability too remote. In late April, a BP oil exploration platform blew up, killing 11 workers, and ever since pumping oil into the Gulf. Salazar's call to halt new approvals does not affect the existing permit for Shell Oil to begin offshore oil drilling in the Chukchi Sea this July. This triggered yet another lawsuit from the Center for Biological Diversity, filing for intent to sue the Interior Secretary. The Center says Salazar is failing to assess the impacts on endangered species of a large oil spill that could result from this summer's offshore exploration drilling in polar bear habitat off Alaska.

Governor signs bills

On Monday, Governor Sean Parnell signed legislation that supports and encourages Cook Inlet natural gas development. Two parts in the bill are designed to stimulate petroleum exploration and production on the North Slope. The bill gives the Department of Natural Resources the power to waive interest on production tax liabilities that arise from the retroactive application of regulations. It also repeals the requirement that small companies make new investments in order to be able to get cash from the state for their credits. Parnell also signed Senate Bill 221 into law, establishing the framework for Alaska merit scholarships and creating the joint legislative higher education scholarship funding task force to come up with funding mechanisms. Alaska merit scholarships may be available by the fall of 2011, after funding issues are resolved. The merit scholarships would range from $2,379 to $4,755 to students who earned them by taking a more rigorous curriculum than currently re-

New appointee named to Board

Governor Sean Parnell on Monday appointed Nathan Turner to the state Board of Game.

Turner is of Nenana and has been making a living by trapping, hunting, fishing and working as a hunting guide and assistant guide. He is a member of the Alaska Trappers Association and the Alaska Professional Hunters Association board of directors. Parnell selected Turner after the Legislature last month rejected the appointment of Al Barrette, a trapper and fur tanner from Fairbanks. Turner's appointment is subject to confirmation by the Alaska State Legislature.

HE'S AGAINST IT (left)-Planning Commissioner Jerald Brown weighs the debate May 4 on approving the preliminary plat submitted by Alaska Gold Co. on a site for the new state building. Brown, an employee of Bering Straits Native Corp., and owners of property on Front Street say the proposed location at the end of Steadman will continue the gutting of the main drag and turn it into skid row.

Planning

tions to follow. ... I don't think we can do anything arbitrary."

The site covers 7.2 acres in three tracts— Tracts A, B, and C, to be renamed 1, 2, and 3, per commission request. The land is bounded on the east by Steadman Street, on the south by Sixth Avenue, a portion of which must be included in the project, on the west by Spokane and on the north, on the brow of the hill, by a line connecting parts of Seventh Avenue to the east and west of the land.

The planning commission has approved the preliminary plat and has the power to approve the final plat, but the Nome Common Council has the say on vacating Sixth Avenue, necessary for the plan to go ahead on the AKG site as currently planned with a 66,000-square-foot building large enough to hold related law enforcement agencies, court, and state offices under the same roof.

The council endorsed the Steadman site by resolution in early March and reversed that stand to favor Front Street in another resolution a month later. In response to the Front Street endorsement, Matt Desalernos, state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities project manager on the building, said the department had looked at all reasonable options for locating the building on Front Street and found none of them competitive with other available sites in the Nome area, such as Steadman Street and other land on the Bypass Road, also north of town.

The current state building stands on Front Street, and holds the Alaska Department of Fish and Game, state elections office and the Legislative Information Office. This building has sustained storm damage. The gold company site is heavily favored by the state, but has been met with opposition from Nome Chamber of Commerce, Front Street businesses, and Sitnasuak and Bering Straits Native corporations who have rental property on Front Street. Opponents of the Steadman site say Front Street will be gutted further, allowing the possibility that it will become an eyesore instead of a small-town downtown. Relocation of state offices, currently tenants, would mean lost rental income for the corporations, representatives say.

As he prepared to vote on the approval, Commissioner Jerald Brown told the panel, "An affirmative vote on my part does not constitute endorsement of the final plan.'

Brown reiterated during discussion that the relocation of offices would hurt Front Street.

'My personal opinion is we wanted to see Front Street revitalization and beautification...make it an attractive place," he said. "Pulling a lot of stuff off Front Street will have the opposite effect.'

Brown works for Bering Straits Native Corp. He has voiced a concern that he might have a conflict of interest in voting measures related to the state building site, but at a previous meeting, Sparks ruled that he could vote. Projected cost for the building is around $39

The planning group approved the Nugget Subdivision with conditions that included the following:

• Include Spokane Street in the formal plat with dedication of right-of-way with a cul-desac to facilitate traffic flow. Commissioners expressed concern that increased traffic would back up or be congested without a turnaround or a loop northward around the building from Spokane Street back to Steadman Street.

· Make sure all buildings in the plat area meet codes for setback distance from streets and lot lines—don't create a need for variances.

 Create utility easements for turn-around for flow in water and sewer services

· Parking must be planned out and specified, not "willy-nilly."

Desalernos was going ahead with plans Monday, happy with the commission's fast action last week.

"I really appreciated the quick turnaround from the planning commission, he said Monday. Desalernos said the added conditions don't worry him. "None of the comments that they generated as part of their conditional approval were unreasonable, so I look forward to completing the replatting process in the near future.

Commissioner Randy Romenesko, former city manager, reminded that the city would have to receive fair market value for the land if Sixth Avenue were vacated for the project. He also informed that there would have to be a built-in allowance for snow removal and storage.

School budget

after severe cuts had to be made two years ago when the district's student count fell way below predictions. State funding for local school districts is based on each district's student population. While budgets are prepared in the spring, the count does not occur until October, requiring districts to peg their budgets on their best guess.

Wehde cautioned that although the budget was presented to the council as balanced, it was done so on the assumption that the student count would be accurate and that salary negotiations with the district's teachers would be resolved with the district's last, best offer standing.

Councilman Jerald Brown asked Wehde how the current budget was standing up against expenses for the year. Jenny Martens, the school district's business manager, said the final budget revision of the year is still pending, but it appeared there would be a positive fund balance at the year's end. "We're going to land on the wheels with some gas in the tank," Wehde said.

Former Governor Wally Hickel dies

Former US Interior Secretary and Alaska Governor Wally Hickel died at 9:52 p.m., Friday, May 7, 2010 of natural causes at Horizon House, part of the Providence Alaska System in Anchorage, Alaska. He was 90.

Hickel helped set the terms of Alaska statehood and convinced President Nixon in 1970 to support the lands claims of Alaska's Native peoples. As governor, he helped drive the discovery of America's proach "there is no legitimate reason for poverty on this earth."

He believed his greatest contribution to Alaska came not as a public official but as a young businessman in 1952 when he flew to DC and convinced Republican Senate leader Bob Taft to re-commit an Alaska statehood bill that would have granted the new state only 3 million out of its 365 million acres. Taft accomplished that re-committal after three tie votes by a vote of 45 to 44.

ber of Alaskans who live in the Arctic would not enjoy full citizenship and the North Slope, the source of the largest part of Alaska's economy, would have remained in federal control.

Hickel's terms as Alaska's Governor occurred over two decades apart. He was elected as a Republican (1966-1968) and later as the Alaska Independence Party candidate (1990-1994). He is remembered in his first term for pushing exploration of Alaska's North Slope when industry leaseholders announced they were leaving. "You drill or I will," he threatened.

In his second term, he settled state and federal claims against Exxon for damages and penalties for $1 billion as a result of the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill, re-claimed over $4 billion of unpaid taxes and royalties from North Slope oil producers, and he fought for the community development quota (CDQ) program which brought the wealth of offshore fisheries onshore to support local development and jobs in Alaska's coastal villages.

In both of his terms as governor and in civic life, he was known for his insistence that the State, not the industry or the federal government, should decide the best use of Alaska's state-owned lands and resources.

Initially, national environmental leaders fought his confirmation as Interior Secretary, but within days of taking office he won praise for shutting down all U.S. offshore oil drilling to upgrade federal regulations following the Santa Barbara oil spill of January 1969.

Under his watch at Interior, the Department was responsible for the functions of the present day EPA and NOAA, and he interceded on dozens of high profile environmental and energy issues for the public good that were detailed in his national best-seller "Who Owns America?" (1971). The White House ignored the first Earth Day on April 22, 1970, but Secretary Hickel led 1,000 Interior employees who spoke on college campuses and in communities throughout the nation.

As Secretary, he clashed with President Nixon's top aides who didn't appreciate his independent thinking and action. Never a fan of the Vietnam War, Hickel strongly opposed the Cambodia Invasion (1970), wrote a critical letter to the president following the Kent State killings, and took giant corporations to court for polluting US waters.

When Nixon fired him "for a mutual lack of respect" on November 25, 1970, Hickel returned to his office at Interior to sign an order putting all eight species of great whales on the Endangered Species List. Two years later, as one of six World Observers at the first UN Conference on the Human Environment in Stockholm, he led a "Whale March" in the streets of Stockholm, resulting in a moratorium on commercial whaling to allow for scientific assessments of all threatened whale populations.

A strong believer that wise development of natural resources and conservation can and must go hand in hand, Secretary Hickel launched the Parks to People program and worked to establish national parks beneath the Golden Gate Bridge in California and the Verrazano-Narrows Bridge in New York, and as Governor used Exxon Valdez settlement funds to buy land for Kachemak Bay State Park, Afognak State Park, and other lands in Alaska.

He fought federal legislation to lock up millions of acres of Alaska lands unnecessarily, and sued the federal government for violating the terms of the Alaska Statehood Act, and yet demonstrated his belief that a Governor, "like the foreman of a ranch" should set aside appropriate lands for conservation.

Hickel believed strongly in building Alaska's science and research capability and supported vocational education. The Alaska SeaLife Center in Seward was built with significant help from Hickel as governor, and later as a fundraiser and financial contributor.

Born August 18, 1919, Walter Joseph Hickel grew up on his parents' Dust Bowl tenant farm during the Depression in Claflin, Kansas, arriving in Alaska in 1940 with 37 cents in his pocket. As he sailed into Prince William Sound on the SS

Yukon he was overwhelmed by the Wrangell Mountains and Mt. Saint Elias and vowed, "You take care of me, and I'll take care of you."

After several months of odd jobs in Anchorage, young Hickel, 1938 welterweight Golden Gloves champ of Kansas, made a name for himself in a boxing ring in Anchorage. He landed a job at the Alaska Railroad and married Jannice Cannon in 1941.

They had one son, Ted; however Jannice became ill and died at the Mayo Clinic in 1943.

In 1945, Hickel married Ermalee Strutz, daughter of Louis and Aline Strutz, pioneering Alaskans. Wally and Ermalee had five more sons - Bob, Wally Jr., Jack, Joe, and Karl, and today they have 21 grandchildren and 7 great grandchildren.

During WWII, he served as a flight inspector for the armed services checking out newly assembled aircraft, including Lend Lease planes destined for Russia and the Eastern Front. After the war, he founded Hickel Construction Company in 1947 building hundreds of homes in Anchorage and Fairbanks as well as shopping centers and hotels, most notably the Hotel Captain Cook, which he built immediately following the 1964 earthquake that devastated downtown Anchorage.

Ever a big thinker, Hickel predicted that the Arctic would become an opportunity for the world. To advance that goal in 1992, he helped found The Northern Forum, and in 1995 established the Institute of the North, an Anchorage-based think tank dedicated to Alaska strategic issues, including caring for and using the "commons" — or commonlyowned lands and resources — to help the people in the North.

In addition to "Who Owns America?" he wrote Crisis in the Commons: The Alaska Solution (2002), later translated into Russian. The Wit and Wisdom of Wally Hickel, a collection of quotations compiled by Malcolm Roberts from his conversations, articles and speeches, was published in 1994.

Like the famed British explorer James Cook, after whom he named his hotel, Hickel sought a transportalargest oilfield at Prudhoe Bay on Alaska's North Slope and established the environmental safeguards for the construction of the trans-Alaska oil pipeline, the first hot oil line ever constructed in the Arctic.

Hickel was well known nationally for standing up to presidents and became a force in uniting the peoples of the Arctic. He helped found The Northern Forum, a circumpolar association of regional governors and was appointed its Secretary-General for life in 1994.

In the last 20 years, Hickel promoted Alaska's "Owner State" that combines a democracy with free enterprise and common ownership of state lands and resources. He took the message to every continent and often stated that with the Alaska ap-

When he returned from DC, Hickel was attacked by Statehood Committee Chair and Anchorage Times publisher Bob Atwood in a blistering 2,500-word editorial headlined "Hickel's Heckles." But, as a result of Hickel's initiative and the efforts of Alaska's three non-voting delegates to Congress, Alaska ended up with 103 million acres from which it has built its economy and an enviable quality of life.

In 1954, as Alaska's Republican National Committeeman, Hickel led a delegation of Alaskans who convinced President Dwight Eisenhower to abandon the plan to grant statehood to only the lower half of Alaska and leave the Arctic as a federal defense reserve. Without that decisive meeting, a significant num-

She raised half of Nome: Beloved caregiver for "Minnie's kids" dies

Minnie A. Tucker Feb. 21, 1953-April 28, 2010

Min, as she was known to many, was mother to Michael; mother-inlaw to Courtney; grandmother to Ariane, Morissa, Honeygirl (Sierra), Summer, Mikey, Jayda and Trace; great-grandmother to Jaelyn; sister to Erwin, Karen, Aver, Violet, Peter and Sam; auntie to Richard, Dennis, Edwin and Emmylou; daughter of Sam and Joyce; and companion to Lloyd "Stinky" Hardy.

Min lived her life the way she was taught and passed that knowledge to everyone, especially to our kids, whom she watched every day. Min was raised to be responsible for her own actions and she taught that to all of us. She may have been strict, but at the same time, she never forgot to teach us the beauty of a sunset or a full salmon net.

Min loved to subsist for food just as much as she loved every child she watched. She would drive to camp every day, as soon as the last child left her house, sad to see them go, but full of anticipation to be at the place she loved the most. At camp, she tended to her garden of rhubarb, lettuce, radishes and green onions. On the land she picked greens, tooguy-ooks and berries. From the water she caught salmon and prepared them to dry, smoke, pickle, can or freeze. Not just for herself, but for everyone who touched her life. Min would comb the beach for firewood and burled logs, just so she could prepare traditional food with her own personal touch, and to heat her cabin, where she was happiest

Whether it was salmon, moose or caribou or even seeds for the tweety birds, she always had plenty for everyone, every year. Min was an incredible cook and often experimented with new recipes to everyone's benefit. You could always count on Min to have something good to eat, on the stove. or in the refrigerator. No one ever went hungry when Min was around. She taught us everything from how to cut fish, to cooking a goose over a barrel stove. Taking care of others, and teaching them to take care of themselves was a big part of her life. Min taught us how, but we can only pray for a fraction of her success.

When she was not making the rest of us a delicious meal, gathering wood or making our children better people, she enjoyed a warm beer and a challenging board or card game. She never stopped taking care of us and our kids, be it a custom cake, gourmet meal, or even a family calendar with pictures; she always put the people around her first.

Min leaves a legacy of being a humble and caring neighbor and friend. She always helped those in need and never expected anything in

All Min ever wanted was for the people she encountered to be happy. We should all take a lesson from her and just be content helping a child, friend or family in need.

On our best day we can only hope to be half the person Minnie Arlene

Minnie Tucker memorial by Cussy Kauer

If you weren't walking right, talking right, or looking right, Minnie Tucker had you hustled out the door RIGHT NOW...without the thank you for stopping in. Tending bar and taking care of the saloon, Minnie was a don't waste my time kind of gal, and didn't mince her words. Taking care of business. On a mission, she had work to do, and in this country where often one is measured by how hard one works, Minnie was a hard worker. Those were the days at the Bering Sea Saloon, where she made the best foot-long sub sandwiches I ever ate, and tried her best to keep Valerie from braining that guy she was married to, Stan.

We grew up together, and in true Nome fashion, you were always comfortably known as somebody's kid, one of those McIvers, or Ezukameows, or Readers, or those Tucker kids.

Minnie came from tough, hardworking stock. The Tucker and the Nelson families (Richard Foster's mom's family) lived down at the Topkok-Bluff area. Sam, her dad, was born at Bluff, and after service to our country, worked there for a mining company with his brother, and after moving to Nome worked for our local mining company for years. Joyce, her mom, was from a well known and old Seward Peninsula family, the Fagerstroms. Together they raised a house full of hazel-eyed Tucker kids. They worked hard, because it's hard work raising a big family, and got by, just like everyone else in Nome.

Minnie quit bartending, and lucky for me, and I'll bet 100 other Moms in town, started babysitting, first in a small apartment of Jerry Miller's, then in a home she bought in Icy View from Jerry Dahl in 1978. Minnie took on the toughest job in town, raising everybody else's kids. We trusted Minnie with God's most precious gift, the lives of our children. As one single gal for the other, and for the next 20 plus years as I had kids, she helped me raise Kelly, Rajene, Krysta, Jade and Dawson, and I'll bet 300 other kids in Nome. Minnie's kids. Minnie had a big pot of soup going just about every morning when I was delivering my kids, preparing for their noon meal. Minnie's kids were well fed, well kept. She and Valerie both delighted in telling me, "If your kids don't want any supper tonight, it's because we've been eating QUAK, or some other delicacy I don't have in my refrigerator. Gee, your kids sure like it!" Then they'd laugh like hell.

The many Miller Christmas parties for all those kids, all Minnie's kids, have turned to a blur in my mind with the passing of time, now just recollecting bits and pieces, and sound bites like the sharp smacking of a stick against a piñata, the crashing of candy to the cement floor, the screams of happy kids, or the whirring of my blender making another batch of margaritas. Minnie's kids always got a Santa, got a stocking, and got a full belly of good food and cookies, thanks to the Millers.

Then, one day, that renegade showed up. Oh my god, we told him, Stinky, you better take good care of our Minnie - or else! Don't you mess with our Minnie! Well, take care of her, he did. She couldn't wait to get to camp with him in the spring, and treasured her life, and life style with him at her side, at her digs down by Safety Sound, and in the shadow of the bluffs of her father's birthplace.

Weeks ago, the last time I saw Minnie was at my Thursday night haunt, pushing my grocery cart at Hanson's Senior night. We stopped to say hello, and how's it goin' Min, and she looked back, and up, at my pack mule standing by me, stretching her double chin up straight as she says, "Is that you, Dawson? My, you've gotten tall." Yep, Dawson was one of Minnie's kids. We chatted and laughed, and here's Min, practically sub-zero outside, parading around in the store in some knee high shorts, tennis shoes and anklets. She spun her cart around, as I leaned on the handle of mine and watched her walk away, wavy curly wisps of grey loosely framing her face, her hair up in a tight knot on the back of her head, she headed off, the sound of the wheels on her cart clanging and creaking faded as she disappeared down the aisle. Yep, Minnie was on a mission, she had work to do, the worker she was, I am sure preparing for the next day's pot of soup, and another bunch of hungry mouths to feed. Bless that Minnie, she raised half of Nome.

I know by now, Minnie's standing at that great checkstand in heaven, her cart piled high, and our heavenly father is making casual conversation, "Hello Minnie, glad you made it! I got a bunch of kids up here and I'm looking for the best babysitter who makes the best soup, with the biggest heart in the world, and I'm thinking that would be you." Yep, Minnie's on a mission, she's got work to do, and a job just right, for the worker she is.

We love you, Minnie. Cussy Kauer

tion corridor to link the East and West across the North. He worked for years to support Russian leaders who favored opening the Northern Sea Route to world commerce.

He helped organize the first "Friendship Flight" which opened the Alaska-Soviet border in 1988. As ice began to retreat in the Arctic, the 2009 Arctic Marine Shipping Assessment, written in part and edited at Hickel's Institute of the North, became the first document of all eight Arctic governments to envision common ground rules and investment for Arctic shipping.

As a believer that big projects are a symbol of a civilization, he promoted a tunnel beneath the Bering Strait to connect the US and Russia and make possible "a railroad around the world." His concept for a water pipeline to transport Alaska's abundant water resources to California received both attention and ridicule in the 1960's and 1990's, and he insisted that it would one day become a reality. As a member of an advisory committee to NASA, he advanced "big projects" to support exploration of Mars and settlement of the moon. He was still talking about those projects as of last month.

With former Governor Bill Egan, a Democrat, he co-founded Commonwealth North in 1979, a non-partisan public policy forum in Anchorage, and Yukon Pacific Corporation in 1983 that obtained the necessary state and federal permits and the export license needed to construct an All-Alaska gas pipeline from Prudhoe to Valdez.

A severe dyslexic and mostly selfeducated, Hickel received 12 honorary college degrees for his accomplishments. In May 1988, His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan bestowed the Grand Cordon of the Order of Sacred Treasury on Hickel for his leadership in establishing trade and friendly relations between Alaska and Japan. During his career, he met with many heads of state and enjoyed close friendships with former Prime Minister Jean Chretien of Canada, President Olafur Ragnar Grimsson of Iceland and the First President of the Sakha Republic in Siberia, Mikhail Niko-

In lieu of flowers, the family has asked that donations be made to the Institute of the North Endowment Fund, Providence Hospital, Commonwealth North or the Alaska SeaLife Center, so that each of these organizations can continue to help the next generation of Alaskans.

"Governor Hickel was a visionary who loved this great state," Governor Parnell said. "He taught us to dream big and to stand up for Alaska. Governor Hickel will be remembered for many things-for his wit, for telling it like it is, and for always reminding us that our resources belong to Alaskans. Ballots prepared for school board recall vote

By Tyler Rhodes

Voters living within the city limits of Nome will be asked to go to the polls May 25 to decide whether the entire school board should be re-

Spurred by a 3-2 vote held Jan. 12 to not renew the contracts of the two administrators at Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School for next year, the recall effort claims the board inappropriately held a closed-door session to come to the decision, among other allegations.

One recall effort brought board members Albert McComas, Heather Payenna, Kirsten Timbers and Gloria Karmun to the ballot. A second effort, using the exact same grounds, delivered the remaining member Barb Nickels to the list as well. Mc-Comas, Payenna and Timbers had cast the votes to deny the contracts to principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer.

The city this week had sample ballots available for view. The ballots include the statements issued by each member in their defense. The grounds for recall and each member's statement are printed verbatim in their entirety below.

Grounds for recall:

[Board member] engaged in misconduct in office, was incompetent, and/or failed to perform his/her prescribed duties when he/she and other Board members;

1) violated Alaska's Open Meetings Act, AS 44.62.310, in connection with the Board's January 12, 2010 executive session by a) convening in executive session without stating clearly or with specificity in their motion to do so the subject of the session; b) discussing principal Janeen Sullivan in the executive session, in ways that might prejudice her, without notifying her that she was being discussed, and without giving her an opportunity to require a public discussion or to waive an applicable confidentiality rights; c) addressing matters in executive session beyond what was appropriate based on the grounds stated in the motion, including budgetary or policy issues like eliminating an administrative

2) acted on Principal Sullivan's and Vice-Principal Boyer's contracts without consideration and discussion complying with Board policy (BB 9010); and

3) violated AS 14.20.149(b)(6) by failing to require an evaluation system that required implementation of a plan for improvement of administrator Janeen Sullivan before nonretaining her without any reason, and against the superintendent's recom-

Albert McComas:

I have been a strong supporter of public education and local control long before being elected to the school board. I have not violated the law or board policy while serving as a board member. I believe every student should receive a high school diploma. Administrators and teachers should strive to get every student to believe in the need for a diploma and work toward that goal.

Barb Nickels:

The allegations of misconduct do not pertain to me. I agree that the executive session was a violation of the Open Meetings Act; however, I did not move for the session, state a nonspecific reason or engage in prejudicial conversations which were initiated by fellow Board members and not appropriate: I was an unwilling participant. Further, I did not seek an improvement plan; I thoroughly reviewed evaluations, supported the Superintendent's recommendation, and did not vote to not retain. My decision was based on facts. Since January, I have been the sole member that has repeatedly asked the Board to rescind actions that were taken and for the Board to reconsider and correct the errors. I have been met with silence and numerous failed motions that could have resolved our actions. Not one Board member has seconded a motion so that we could hold a discussion and share with the public. I hold myself to high standards, accountability and conduct to meet the public trust. I have also committed my honesty and impartiality to our community and would be proud to complete this commitment. Please allow me to continue to serve Nome Public Schools and especially our kids.

Heather Payenna:

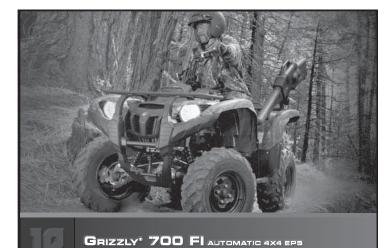

I was born and raised in Nome and whole-heartedly care about the wellness and education of not only the community, but especially the children on Nome. Since graduating, I've worked in positions with Nome Pubic Schools, Kawerak Inc., and Nome Eskimo Community. In all three positions I've worked with students of all ages and wanted nothing more but to improve the education and increase the opportunities for our kids. This recall is not about whether you agree or disagree with the decision the School Board has made. This recall election is purely about accusations against members of the School Board. These accusations are not proven, valid, or legitimate. In no way, shape, or form have any laws been broken, or have any violations been committed. Support YOUR School Board. Vote No!

Gloria Karmun:

As a lifelong Nome resident and School, it is an honor to serve the community of Nome. In true democratic form, the school board is ruled by majority. As members of the board, we strive to conduct business in a manner that will represent the concerns of the entire community. This is accomplished by each member having an equal vote in board decisions. Although I voted in the minority on January 12, 2010, I stand continued on page 14

How to handle heartburn

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Heartburn is one of the most common reasons patients go to the doctor. It is usually caused by acid from the stomach leaking backward up into the esophagus and throat.

As food or fluid is swallowed, the body is designed to move the fare from the mouth to the...well, you know, the other end...in an amazingly orchestrated series of steps. The movement is normally forward. Muscular valves, called sphincters, open to allow food to pass and then close to prevent reflux, or backward movement of digesting food.

Heartburn occurs when acidic digestive juices from the stomach are allowed to travel backward into the esophagus. The esophagus runs through the chest from the back of the throat to the stomach just behind the heart, which is why the burning sensation is often felt as a burning of the heart, or heartburn.

Left untreated, heartburn can lead to a dangerous degradation of the lining of the esophagus, possibly leading to problems swallowing, esophagitis, or worse, esophageal cancer.

Treatment of heartburn may begin at home in three simple steps:

First, people with heartburn must reduce or discontinue the use of substances that make the problem worse. Acidic beverages, like dark colas, burn the esophagus and are one of the most common causes of heartburn. I once heard a gastroenterologist, a doctor who specializes in care of the stomach and intestines, say that the "pop" industry keeps him busy. Alcohol, citrus drinks, tomatoes, ketchup, and spicy foods may also irritate the esophageal lining and should be limited when heartburn occurs.

Coffee and other caffeinated beverages do not directly irritate the esophagus, but caffeine tends to induce the release of stomach acid. This combined with reflux may make the problem worse. Interestingly chocolate and peppermint cause a relaxation of the esophageal sphincter, making reflux more likely.

You could say a mint-chocolate mocha would not be the best beverage choice for a person with heart-burn.

Pain medications like ibuprofen or aspirin as well as some osteoporosis medications can worsen symptoms of heartburn. Your doctor will explain special precautions to take to prevent heartburn when these medicines are prescribed.

Second, heartburn tends to improve with a few basic lifestyle changes. Weight reduction is key. Special attention to the loss of intraabdominal fat by limiting the intake of simple sugars and alcohol will decrease the pressure that forces acid from the stomach back into the esophagus.

Smoking cessation is also important because tobacco weakens the sphincter between the esophagus and stomach and increases the risk of esophagitis and esophageal cancers.

Exercise is helpful because physical activity improves the forward movement of food. Similarly, small, healthy, well-balanced meals are less likely than large meals to cause reflux of digestive juices.

Some people find it helpful to raise the head of the bed by 6 to 9 inches putting gravity to work in order to reduce reflux while sleeping. Eating a meal several hours before lying down is also helpful.

Stress reduction is important for people prone to anxiety induced-gastric acid production.

Third, symptomatic relief is available over-the-counter in several forms. Antacids containing magnesium and/or calcium (Tums, Rolaids, etc.) neutralize acid and provide temporary relief. Special histamine blockers like ranitidine (Zantac), cimetidine (Tagamet HB), or famotidine (Pepcid AC) provide longer relief by blocking one of the receptors that trigger the release of acid in the stomach. For maximum suppression of acid, in order to allow healing of the esophagus, many doctors recommend a proton-pump inhibitor like omeprazole (Prilosec), which is now available over-the-counter for short-term use.

Heartburn can also mimic the symptoms of a heart attack. Any pain associated with shortness of breath that worsens with exertion, or pain that radiates to the back or arms is reason for immediate medical evaluation.

See your provider if heartburn is occurring more than two times weekly, since this may be a sign of more serious conditions, like gastroesophageal reflux disease (GERD), gastritis, peptic ulcer disease, or gall-

But when we write political press commentary, just as our faculty colleagues do in Alaska and nationwide, Hamilton's telling us we can't use University resources such as sharing it over internal University list-serves set up specifically as "a forum to share information."

Nationally, imagine Paul Krugman, an economics professor, having to clear his New York Times columns with administrators at Princeton. Here in Alaska, other faculty, such as UA professors Steve Haycox and Alan Borass, periodically publish press commentary that has criticized Palin and other politicos. Hamilton's office has issued no "prior restraint" orders on them. (We've shared their work internally with colleagues.)

Why have we been singled out? Well, we have publicly questioned Hamilton's cozy relationship with the oil industry, top-down management style, and lavish spending on administration that Hamilton's own consultants said needs big cuts. Meanwhile, year after year, Hamilton has hiked tuition on students. We have published this dissent because we believe a university needs to keep corporate influence in check. We believe university funds are better spent in the classroom than on administration. And we reserve the right to say what we believe in public.

Bureaucracies, like democracies, need sunlight.

And it takes very few examples of intimidation to chill academic freedom. UA Professor Rick Steiner, an internationally renowned oil spill expert, recently was forced to resign after UA's administrators and outside funders felt threatened by his emphasis on conservation. He had challenged offshore oil development in Bristol Bay and in the Arctic as well as UA's bias favoring Big Oil.

Ironically, the federal government later agreed with Steiner and pulled Bristol Bay oil lease sales. (All this holds more significance after the current massive Gulf of Mexico oil spill, which could easily dwarf Alaska's Exxon Valdez disaster.)

Long-time Alaska public radio journalist Steve Heimel said the federal government muzzled Steiner, as UA stood by.

"The University failed to protect him," Heimel said. "The situation went beyond cowardice," to dishonesty when the University claimed it was doing Steiner a favor by retaining him as long as it did," he said.

In the early 1960s, in a clear contravention of academic freedom, UA president William R. Wood fired two professors after they opposed Project Chariot, a bizarre scheme to excavate a harbor on Alaska's coastline using nuclear bombs.

In spite of his claims to the contrary, Hamilton's understanding of academic freedom and free speech seems no more enlightened than was Wood's 50 years ago.

Now comes "Drill Baby Drill" Palin, a potential U.S. presidential candidate, who supports offshore drilling in Alaska. If that includes the treacherous, ice-choked Chukchi Sea, a major spill could spell disaster for local Inupiat, who have harvested whales, seals, and other animals here for thousands of years.

To this day, the people of the Arctic remain grateful to those professors who helped save their homeland from catastrophe in the 1960s. Today the oil industry is courting our region of Alaska heavily to drill in the Chukchi Sea.

If we see another Chariot-like environmental disaster brewing here, we will write commentary on any politician's environmental policies, including Palin and Barack Obama, just as UA faculty did decades ago and as our fellow UA commentators do today.

Susan B. Andrews and John Creed are journalism/humanities professors at Chukchi College, UA's branch in Kotzebue, where they have taught since the late 1980s. Their latest book, "Purely Alaska: Authentic Voices from the Far North," will be released in June.

UA Board of Regents Policy on Free Speech

Freedom of Speech P02.01.07

An environment of free and honest inquiry is essential to the functioning and the mission of the University. The Board of Regents and the University of Alaska therefore acknowledge, affirm, and espouse the right of freedom of speech as guaranteed in the Constitutions of the United States and the State of Alaska.

The essential purpose of the University of Alaska is to engage in the pursuit of truth, the advancement of learning and the dissemination of knowledge. To achieve this purpose, all members of the University of Alaska must be assured of the constitutionally protected right to question, speculate, and comment, as well as the right to criticize the University and society at large.

The University will not limit or abridge any individual's constitutional right to free speech.

by our decision, which was met in a legal and ethical manner. My motivation to serve is to meet the needs of every student of Nome Public Schools. Thank you for your support.

Kirsten Timbers:

I am a lifelong Nome resident who greatly values the importance of public education for all students. I would like to refute the accusations made against me:

1) The claim that the Board violated opens meeting act is not valid. The School Board has the right to convene in executive session in accordance with AS 44.62.310 and Board Bylaw 9321 which reads; "matters which by law...are required to be confidential." Additionally, the Board had the executive session on the agenda and stated the reason for the session was to discuss, "Personnel Matters."

2) The claim that the Board has not provided evidence for supporting its decision is restricted by Board Bylaw 9011; "confidential information which comes out during executive session of the Board shall not be divulged or released...subject to applicable laws regarding executive session and confidential records."

3) The claim that the Board violated AS 14.20.149(b)6 is not valid. The District has the right to assign certified staff to any position that they are qualified for according to AS 14.21.158(2). The executive session and subsequent action was legal and within the authority of the Board. With your support I will continue to serve our schools. Please vote No!

and the state permits related to Rock Creek. Van Nieuwenhuyse, who was in town for the meeting along with several managers from the state departments of Natural Resources and Environmental Conservation, would only say that NovaGold is currently working on a plan for Rock Creek. "We are moving toward a decision point sometime in the fall, September or October," he said.

That decision point coincides with the DNR's requirement that NovaGold notify the state of its preliminary and future intentions at Rock Creek by Nov. 1. The requirement falls under the company's certificate to operate the tailings dam at the mine site.

Since progress toward mining the site was halted in November 2008, a great deal of the work performed at Rock Creek has centered around that dam. The dam was designed to hold back the waste product after gold was extracted from the ore. That waste, or tailings, was to be a paste-like material that would absorb water finding its way behind the dam. With no mining going on at the site, and thus no tailings, runoff water and precipitation collected and built up behind the dam to levels that alarmed state regulators.

NovaGold used the May 6 meeting to detail the work it had accomplished over the past 16 months to both reinforce the dam and get rid of a great deal of the water that had accumulated behind it. Nome-based NovaGold manager John Odden, who primarily gave the details of the mine's activities at the meeting, said the earthen buttress built to reinforce the dam measures 20 feet high and 40 feet wide.

According to a diagram NovaGold prepared for the meeting, the water level behind the dam reached as high as approximately 153 feet in elevation last summer. The dam's top sits at 160 feet.

Primarily through the use of a series of wells that inject the water back underground, NovaGold was able to move approximately 129 million gallons of water from behind the dam, bringing the water level down to below 140 feet. The company also constructed a water treatment plant in the past year to process the water before it pumped back underground. "The performance of the plant was really remarkable," Odden told those gathered for the meeting.

The installation of the buttress and getting below the 140-foot mark helped put the mine back square with the state's dam safety engineer, Charles Cobb. "I don't think we have any immediate safety issues with the dam as it now stands. Last year we did," said Cobb, who was in attendance at the meeting.

Odden reported at the meeting that the water level at the start of May stood at roughly 137 feet. Cobb said he expects NovaGold to continue efforts to minimize the amount of water stored behind the dam. Part of that effort came through the use of snow-making guns which took water from where it collects at the toe of dam and sprayed it on the hillside above the structure. "The idea is to broadcast [the water] and let it evaporate," Odden said.

NovaGold said the guns were able to process 4.2 million gallons of water in the fall. Whatever water doesn't evaporate eventually makes its way back to the tailings pond.

Van Nieuwenhuyse also said NovaGold would be applying to the state for a permit that would allow the mine to discharge the treated water to the surface, allowing it eventually flow in area streams. Van Nieuwenhuyse said he couldn't detail exactly where the water would flow, noting that would be part of the work that would go into the permitting process.

DRAWDOWN—NovaGold reported at its annual Rock Creek meeting held in Nome May 6 that it has experienced success in drawing down the large buildup of water from behind its tailings dam. The dam is the V-shaped formation in the foreground of this photo taken in mid March.

eral regulators have also held NovaGold's feet to the fire when it comes to how storm water collects and moves through the mine site. "In Nome, we've been focused on one or two things—water management, water management." Van Nieuwenhuyse said.

To get a handle on the storm water, crews at the mine site performed work on three water diversion channels. Projects included seeding the walls of some of the channels, creating settling ponds, and improving the bedding, sidewalls and outfalls of the channels. The efforts are essentially aimed at preventing erosion and the resultant sediment that would then mix with the water and enter natural streams in the area. "Our marching orders have been to manage the water, and I think we're doing a pretty good job of it," Odden said.

In addition to the water update, Odden gave a quick rundown on the staffing out at the mine. In 2009, he said 18 full-time employees were at work with 19 fixed-term employees on site. For 2010, he said those numbers have shifted to 28 full-time and six fixed-term workers. Later in the meeting, Van Nieuwenhuyse said 150 to 160 people would be working at the mine if it were to be in full production.

Gravel business to change

Speaking to the Nome Nugget after the meeting, commented on some likely changes this summer to the company's gravel operations around Nome. While local gravel operations in past years have been handled by local operators, Van Nieuwenhuyse said the company was looking to streamline. "We wanted to consolidate the gravel business and have one operator come in and do it," he said.

To that end, Van Nieuwenhuyse said NovaGold put out a request for proposals and is now negotiating with a contractor. Due to those negotiations, he said he could not announce who that potential operator is, but said an announcement could come soon.

Noting that gravel is not the core business for the company, he called this a transition year for gravel operations with local contractors having stockpiles to deal with. "It's not like we're writing everyone off," he said of local operators.

Peninsula rattled by earthquake

By Tyler Rhodes

Anyone still asleep in Brevig Mission at 10:30 a.m. last Thursday received an abrupt wake-up call to jolt them out of their dreaming.

Centered 19 miles away, a 4.56 magnitude earthquake rattled walls and furniture in the village just after 10:30 a.m., May 13, according to the Alaska Earthquake Information Center. "We had a big pop, things jumped and that was it," reported Brevig Mission School Principal Robin Gray.

Tentative teacher salary agreement struck

Board gives nod to deal that would give teachers 2%, 3% and 2.5% raises for the next three years

By Tyler Rhodes

After one round of mediation—in the wake of failed direct negotiations earlier this yearthe Nome Education Association and the school district came to a tentative agreement on salaries for the next three years May 11.

The Nome Board of Education gave its approval to the agreement at a special noon meeting May 18 at the Sitnasuak Native Corp. board room. Teachers were to vote on the agreement the next two years.

May 19 and 20. The Nome Education Association's executive board planned on meeting on the afternoon of May 20 to ratify the vote.

If the deal gets the blessing from a majority of teachers union members, educators next year will see a 2 percent raise, a 3 percent increase in 2011-2012 and a 2.5 percent raise in 2012-2013. The initial negotiations between the two entities only aimed at establishing salaries for next Tuesday, there is no sign that the tension between a vocal segment of the public and the majority of the board has abated.

In a written statement, the teacher negotiating team voiced its full support of the agreement. The team noted that all other provisions of the contract negotiated in 2009 would remain unchanged. The agreement would stand from July 1, 2010 to June 30, 2013.

The board's final regularly scheduled meeting before the May 25 vote largely resembled each meeting and work session held since the board voted Jan. 12 to replace the administrators at the junior/senior high school next year. Members of public again came forward May 11 to admonish the board over the decision and to ask them to reinstate principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer. Board member Barb Nickels once again tried to put a motion on the table to readdress the

Jan. 12 vote and was met with renewed silence from her fellow board members as she looked for a second.

The board's March and April meetings largely dealt with the district's 2010-2011 budget. Whether or not an assistant principal would be included at all in the in next year's lineup became the focal point of the budget debate. When the position made it into the approved budget, several members of the public stood up and asked that Boyer be returned to his job.

The board has yet to offer an official reason for the termination of either administrator, neither to the public nor to Sullivan and Boyer, citing confidentiality provisions extended to the board for personnel matters. Board member Albert McComas said in the meeting that the board does not have discretion to make such an announcement, rather the decision lies with the superintendent.

Superintendent Jon Wehde had given both administrators positive reviews and had advocated for their retention before the board met behind closed doors Jan. 12 to discuss the matter. Those pushing for the recall argue that the closed-door session was improperly held. Wehde announced at a May 18 special noon meeting that the district's attorney had upheld that the executive session was properly handled.

At the May 18 meeting-held to vote on a new salary agreement with teachers (see story above)-Nickels attempted to have the board vote on releasing the content of the Jan. 12 executive session. While acknowledging that board bylaws do allow for such a vote, board president Gloria Karmun said she had no interest in releasing the information.

Board member Kirsten Timbers said one of the two administrators had made a request for the information pertaining to him that was dis-

Dear Nancy:

I was saddened and disgusted to see the signs "Vote Native. Vote No" on telephone poles around town this weekend. Hasn't this school board issue divided our town enough the last few months? Now someone is making it a race issue as well! I, for one, don't cast my votes based on race; I cast my votes according to how well I believe a candidate would do, no matter who they are. I wish someone had thought about what they were doing before they decided to put these signs up. Sincerely, Linda Steiger Nome, AK

A Matter of Principles

Next Tuesday Nomeites will get an opportunity to stand up for our right to know what is happening in local government. We will get a chance to hold school board officials accountable and demand transparency in the governing of our schools. We will have a chance to tell our elected officials what happens when they refuse to explain their actions, break the law and do not follow due process when they are dealing with the public. They are afraid to say if their mysterious decisions are based on cultural, racial, financial or retaliatory issues. To date they have neither given an explanation of their behavior nor have they responded to citizen requests for justification of their Draconian behavior.

How can we expect this bizarre behavior to have anything but a negative impact on the education of our students? How can we expect professional educators to want to work for a school district where the school board can fire on a whim, without a reason and with no due process? What if the board in their sublime arrogance doesn't like the kind of science that is taught, thinks calculus is extraneous, wants its version of history in the curriculum, sees no need for foreign language, or wants only religious music (their brand) played by the band? Why should we trust the education of our children to a board that makes such arbitrary and wrongheaded interpretations of the foundation of American education?

The public school system should reflect the community and the community of Nome is not an ignorant, backstabbing, spiteful, bigoted group of hard-heads who are afraid to let their actions stand open to the light of day. It seems that the board justifies its actions by the fact that they were born here. Give us a break! The principles of open government and fairness need to be the standards by which we run a school district. School board members McComas, Karmun, Payenna and Timbers need to be removed from the board. Nomeites are not without recourse. There are compelling reasons to remove the board. This Tuesday put democracy into action and vote "yes" for their removal. - N.L.M.-

know.) A few residents have admitted to knowing why the board has made the decisions they did. While the employees themselves were not told, apparently some people outside of the school board are 'in the know'. Why? Are these just rumors? Was there a reason? If there was a reason, shouldn't someone tell the people who were punished so that it doesn't happen again? If both the School Board Policy and the state law outline the procedures for due process, is there any legal enforcement of these procedures? If our School Board Policies are ignored and violated repeatedly, does that not erode their value? Why do we even bother having them? Can they be enforced arbitrarily? Who has to pay for the legal repercussions?

I'm afraid this entire fiasco will not end on May 25. This town needs healing. If those supporting the students win the election, the racism issues will not go away. If those supporting the school board win the election, there will still be many parents fighting for what's best for their kids. I'd like to believe that we live in a city that values education, youth and racial equality. Let's address them in an effective manner.

It's time we, the residents of Nome roll up our sleeves and get to work. We have residents who are hurting. We have children to educate. We have so much to gain by working together. And we're not going to get there by ignoring racial issues, or firing administrators. If this team of school board members can't get it done, then let's recall them and put people in there that can. Yes, the new board can consist of all Nome-born and raised members... they simply have to follow the board policies, state laws and support students. Let's build relationships, not tear them down. Our students are worth every ounce of effort we can rally. Please vote in support of them. Respectfully, Joy Hewitt Nome, AK

What is so important about Alaska's Open Meeting laws?

By Betsy Brennan

Many people have asked me questions about what Open Meeting Laws have to do with the Nome School Board Recall Election on May 25. What I have learned about open meetings has been through being on Nome Public School Board for three years, reading on the subject, and in attending the Association of Alaska School Boards annual trainings.

The basic objective of the Alaska's Open Meetings Act is to support the right of all community members to know what goes on in their government by requiring public bodies like the Nome School Board to conduct nearly all business at open meetings. The Act's purpose is to ensure that decisions made and actions taken are public knowledge and represent the will of the people. An elected official's violation of the Open Meeting laws constitutes failure to perform the duties of that office, and is one of the lawful grounds for recall of an elected official. The Board may meet in closed sessions only to discuss certain matters as allowed by Alaska's Open Meetings Act. This kind of closed session is called an executive session.

This is an excerpt from the Alaska Division of Community and Regional Affairs website:

There must be a real and legitimate need for the executive session and the reason must be spelled out in the motion to go into executive session. The motion must state specifically what will be discussed and must be approved by a majority vote. The motion must contain enough detail that the public (and if necessary a court) will be informed of exactly why the executive session is appropriate, without defeating the purpose of going into executive session. Only the item(s) identified in the motion may be discussed in the executive session.

"The only subjects that the Board may discuss in an executive session of the Board are:

- 1. matters, the immediate knowledge of which would clearly have an adverse effect upon the finances of the school district:
- 2. subjects that tend to prejudice the reputation and character of any person, provided the person may request a public discussion (note: the subject individuals must be provided personal notice and be informed of the option to request public discussion);

- 3. matters which by law, municipal charter, or ordinance are required to be confidential; or
- 4. matters involving consideration of government records that by law are not subject to public disclosure (this would include student privacy is-

I want to pay specific attention to number 2 above. This part of the law is provided to protect students and employee privacy interests that would be affected by a public discussion. The executive session is supposed to protect the reputation and character of the person discussed in the closed-door session. If the School Board meets in executive session to discuss issues regarding specific people, those individuals must be informed of this and given the option to request the meeting take place

One of the primary reasons this school board recall was initiated was the fact that individuals employed by the district were discussed and not invited into the closeddoor meeting on January 12, 2010. This violated Alaska Statute 44.62.310.

The reason given for the executive session on January 12 was "personnel matters". The executive session occurred on the agenda directly before an action item to renew five administrator's contracts. Immediately after coming out of a nearly one hour and thirty minute executive session, the board split up the contracts to vote on individually instead of voting on them as a whole. The superintendent highly recommended that all of the contracts be renewed. Two of the five administrators up for contracts were denied them on a 3-2 vote by the board. Another note of interest is when these motions were made and seconded, there was no call for any discussion on the actions. The rest is now history.

Native American economic advisory council proposed in Senate

Last week Senator Daniel Inouye (D-Hawaii) introduced legislation in Congress that would create the first Native American economic advisory council. The intent of the bill is to establish an official entity to give input and share ideas with the executive branch. The new council would help find ways to improve the quality of Native American life and living conditions and access to basic public services, to the levels enjoyed by the average citizen and community of the United States by the year 2025. The idea of such a council came out of last year's Alaska Federation of Natives' insight competition. Alaska Senators Mark Begich and Lisa Murkowski co-sponsored the bill. It is called the Native American Economic Advisory Council Act of 2010, S. 3331, and has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

USFWS takes testimony on ANWR

The US Fish and Wildlife Service is in the process to revise the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge comprehensive conservation plan and is taking testimony and public comment. During hearings in Anchorage last week, oil and gas development proponents as well as critics showed up to testify. Alaska governor Sean Parnell also submitted his comments saying that a new refuge plan could potentially affect the most promising unexplored petroleum region in North America. Parnell opposes any plan or wilderness review process that hinders oil and gas development on the coastal plain. especially the area marked as 1002. His arguments were to keep good-paying jobs in Alaska and to reduce import of oil from foreign countries. In addition to last week's gathering in Anchorage, public meetings were held in Washington DC, Venetie, Fort Yukon, Arctic Village, Fairbanks and Kaktovik. The Comprehensive Conservation

Plan is to establish refuge management goals and objectives and will include wilderness and wild and scenic river reviews. For detailed information go to http://arctic.fws.gov/ccp.htm

Millrock to explore at Bluff and Council

In a statement to investors, minerals exploration upstart Millrock Inc. said that it has packaged two large projects, predominantly land leased from the Bering Straits Native Corporation, to unlock the mineral wealth of "this rich but under-explored region of Alaska." At Bluff, 2008 drilling exploration confirmed a gold resource, and drilling is slated to continue in July. Millrock's Council project is on three land tracts including Council, Albion and Warm Creek and surrounding areas. Millrock partnered up with Kinross Gold Corp., and drilling is planned to begin in June with Millrock as

AFN focuses on Village Survival

This year's theme for the annual Alaska Federation of Natives convention is "Village Survival". The AFN board decided to put special emphasis on exploring education, movement of peoples, sustainable economies and contributing to the country's economic recovery. Gloria O'Neill, President and CEO of the Cook Inlet Tribal Council, will deliver this year's keynote address. The annual AFN event will take place on October 21 to 23 at the Carlson Center in Fairbanks. The weeklong gathering will have a Trade Fair, the usual "Quyanna Night" dance performances, AFN awards for outstanding achievements and a closing reception and banquet on October 23.

Bills signed by the Governor

Bills – including the state's budget bill for fiscal year 2011 - are piling up at Governor Sean Parnell's desk and this is what he signed in the past week: House Bill 280, the Cook Inlet Recovery Act is now law. The bill creates a legal framework and financial incentives for developing large-scale natural gas storage facilities throughout the state. The legislation is to benefit consumers not only in South-Central but also in Fairbanks, where gas could be shipped from the North Slope. It gives tax credits to exploration companies to encourage exploration and development of new gas, and the Regulatory Commission of Alaska is now required to consider the negative impacts to consumers when denying applications for gas supply contracts. Parnell also signed Senate Bill 222, House Bill 324 and Senate Bill 110 last week. The bills seek to curb sexual assault and domestic violence. Senate Bill 222, sponsored by the governor, better protects children and all assault victims. The bill toughens laws on child pornography by giving law enforcement more tools to pursue those engaged in viewing and distributing child pornography. It says that a person convicted of possession or distribution of child pornography or human trafficking may not be given a suspended sentence.

House Bill 324, also sponsored by the governor, enhances crime victims' rights and Senate Bill 110, sponsored by Senator Hollis French, deals with DNA evidence retention. It aims to improve the laws relating to the DNA databank and establishes a task force to review current evidence retention.

NOAA seeks Arctic vision and strategy

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration is looking for public input to a draft high-level framework document on the federal agency's goals and priorities in the Arctic. NOAA said in the draft document that the Arctic has profound significance for climate and functioning of ecosystems around the globe and that the region would be particularly vulnerable and prone to rapid change. In response to this, NOAA wants to come up with a strategic approach to deal with the change and its effects on humans and coastal communities. The 32-page draft is posted at www.arctic.noaa.gov/docs/arctic_strat_2010.pdf. Comments must be submitted by June 10, 2010 to the e-mail address strategic.planning@noaa.gov.

Climber dies on Mt. McKinley

A French climber fell to his death while climbing Mt. McKinley on Sunday, May 16. Pascal Frison, 51, lost control of his sled and when he tried to stop it from sliding over the ridge he tumbled and fell over 1,000 feet into a steep, crevassed section. Witnesses saw the fall and made a radio distress call to Denali Park rangers. A helicopter and mountaineering rangers responded. Ranger Kevin Wright hovered on the end of a 'short-haul' line, hanging beneath the helicopter at the end of a 120-foot rope, and was lowered into the crevasse. Wright could not reach the climber who was lying an additional 20 feet down in the crevasse, but he could tell that the climber did not survive the fall. NPS rangers have returned to the site on Monday to determine if Frison's body can be recovered.

Office of the Commissioner 3132 Channel Drive PO Box 112500 Juneau, AK 99811-2500

Honorable Commissioner von Scheben: The Bering Straits Native Corporation has its central office in Nome, Alaska. We have invested a considerable amount of money into the local economy through various infrastructure such as our BSNC office building housing 25,000 s.f. of commercial office space; the best hotel in town with 54 rooms and meeting rooms, and apartment buildings and other commercial structures; annually contributing $200,000 to the combination school districts of the City of Nome School District and the Bering Strait School District for its regional vocational operation called NACTEC; contributing at least $200,000 to the Bering Straits Foundation that distributes all of those funds to our regional postsecondary education efforts through scholarships; employ on an average 55 people in Nome for our business operations (including 15 in our main office) on a year round basis, peaking up to 100 people during the summer; manage over 2 million acres of subsurface estate throughout the region including property surrounding the well known Rock Creek Mine operated by Nova Gold; and sundry list of other operations like the only car rental operation in the city with 50 vehicles, heavy equipment rentals, mining camp site support equipment, etc. We are proudly one of the largest tax paying operations in Nome and annually pay the State of Alaska $1 million a year in taxes and remit another $250,000 in local property and sales taxes on an annual basis

With that introduction, we are somewhat dismayed that the State of Alaska is willing to disregard all of these BSNC investments in Nome. Instead it will use its own wealth to purchase new office building property away from downtown Nome where currently the vast majority of the local business operates on a day-to-day, monthly and annual basis. We wish to have you reconsider your plans to build away from Downtown Nome and instead hold well publicized local hearings about the effects your plans would have on Nome and the surrounding region. We think this would prevent the public from feeling the State is making a decision for its own best interest and not the interest of the public.

Additionally, we hope you will consider the following in rethinking your plans for a new office building outside of the downtown business district in Nome:

1. The site you are considering is in what is primarily a residential district at the end of Steadman Street, which is a substandard, narrow street that is not straight and has structures encroaching on the right of way, so entering Steadman from the many side streets is dangerous even now since you can't see down the street without pulling into the line of traffic to get a view of oncoming traffic. This is compared to Front Street that, if needed, could probably hold a 4-lane highway with its current width, but is now operating very safely as a two way street.

2. The other primary street that would be used for commuting to the new site (5th Avenue) is a school bus route twice day for most of students of Nome, as the elementary school is located on 5th. Additional traffic on this street would create many safety issues going directly against one of the highest charges for the State to provide public safety for its residents, especially school aged children walking to school during the darkest days of the school year.

3. Even with a few paved streets in Nome, the area being considered by the State for the new site of your office building has some of the worst dust conditions in the City and the high level of traffic generated by this building is going to greatly exacerbate the problem.

4. The tax paying businesses on Front Street would be negatively impacted by all of the State offices moving away from the only real business district in Nome. Around seven years ago the local village corporation built a brand new three-story office building on Front Street and now accommodates many of the existing State offices. If they moved to the new office building, Front Street would be overpopulated with empty Class A office space, reducing the tax revenue for both the City and the State of Alaska. This drastically counters free enterprise at an expense caused by the State of Alaska.

Connected to this argument, the State of Alaska is working towards putting all of the State offices in Nome in one building. While this would create a segregated office building only for the State's bureaucracy, it would do nothing in generating a local economy, but does just the opposite.

As a counter proposal, we propose the State consider separating various departments into groups and house some into a new office building built on Front Street (even if it is smaller than currently planned) and utilize the existing (and tax paying) properties existing on Front Street to house the remaining office groups.

The Federal Government currently houses the U.S. Post Office in a downtown locale, already convenient for the State and local offices. They have plans to move that operation to an out of town location, creating a major inconvenience for the local residents, many of whom don't drive. Many of these are our shareholders and if both the Federal and State governments move their operations away from Front Street, our already high cost of living would increase, creating another negative impact on local residents, taxpayers and our shareholders, which is completely counter to the notion of good government.

In a nutshell, we welcome the State of Alaska to use its resources, including a massive resource of planning expertise, to meet with Nome's local residents, businesses and institutions. We will all be impacted by the final decision and we offer that the best way to make your decision the most effective (and less destructive) is to do your planning with the local

Nome resources. Sincerely,

The Leadership of Bering Straits Native Corporation

Foster's Report

FISH AND GAME BUDGET INCREASES FOR THE A-Y-K REGION By Rep. Neal Foster

Salmon stocks on the Yukon and Kuskokwim rivers have been in decline. This decline and issues with accuracy and timing of counts has led to closures of the commercial and subsistence fisheries that are so important to the coastal villages in the YK delta. These closures left families not only without fish for the winter but also without much needed income for fuel, electricity and the other staples of life taken for granted in most urban areas. Governor Parnell has only been in office a short time, but is showing his understanding of the issues and sympathy for the people affected. One of his first acts in office was to sign a disaster declaration that had been sitting on the previous governor's desk without action. Since signing this declaration the Governor has been asking the federal government to do the same. On January 15 Secretary Locke made a fisheries disaster declaration and consequently Congress is in the process of hopefully approving a federal fisheries disaster appropriation of $10.8 million. This funding would go for direct compensation for fishermen and processing workers, and for nets and research.

Towards this end, it was reported that the Senate Appropriations Committee today agreed to U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski's request to include $5 million in a 2010 supplemental appropriations bill to help mitigate the Yukon River Chinook salmon fishery

"Low returns in the Yukon River Chinook salmon fishery have exacted a heavy toll on the communities that depend on this fishery for their livelihood, and I was pleased to be able to include $5 million in disaster assistance in the 2010 supplemental appropriations bill," said Murkowski, a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee.

On the State level, a capital expenditure of $1,125,000 for the Bering Sea Fisherman's Assn (AYK SSI) was approved by the legislature and forwarded to the Governor. $800,000 was written into the Operating budget as a grant to the Bering Sea Fishermen's Assn. to operate Alaska Yukon Kuskokwim Sustainable Salmon Initiative. The money will be used for salmon research in the (A-Y-K) Arctic-Yukon-Kuskokwim river systems and can be used as a state match to help secure the aforementioned federal fisheries disaster dollars.

Additional Operating Budget increments include:

A $380,000 increase for Salmon Research and Management Projects for the Arctic-Yukon-Kuskokwim Region, including:
• $50,000 for the Lower Yukon River test fishery which provides in-season assessment of salmon run abundance and run timing; • $80,000 for maintenance and enhancement of AYK Region data archiving and re-

• $75,000 for Chinook Salmon Genetic Stock Identification;

$75,000 for a Yukon Area Management Fishery Biologist II;
$100,000 for an AYK Regional Fishery Biologist IV to address current staffing needs for existing research and management programs region wide (this position and previous one were cut two years ago).

While veto discussions usually focus on the Capital Budget it is important to remember that the operating budget is subject to the Governors' line item veto power as well. The Governor has indicated that he will be looking for places to cut the operating budget. I'm hopeful that his actions so far relating to the Yukon/Kuskokwim fisheries disaster indicates his recognition of the importance of these programs and the need for these increments. I will be watching this issue at the local, state and federal level with the needs of our people in mind.

cussed in the closed session. "I think it would be appropriate to offer responses to the individuals," she said, signaling that she would not support the board's release of the information. While no district representative mentioned which administrator had made the information request, Boyer had referenced his wait for a response at the May 11 meeting.

Wehde said that the request would be answered by the district's attorney this week. He also noted that once the information is in the hands of the employee who requested it, he could share it publicly if he wishes.

Despite an apparent lack of interest from fellow board members, Nickels pressed on May 18 with her effort to get a vote on whether or not to release the information. Karmun said the proper manner to handle the matter would be to have it added to the next meeting's agenda. Nickels requested that it be included.

Public pleas continue

In the public comment section of the May 11 meeting, Sullivan addressed the board. "In light of the lack of any official reason given for non-retention—the reason not officially stated has been budget-I would ask that Doug Boyer be returned to his position at the high school," she said.

Sullivan's request echoed those made by elementary teacher Liz Korenek-Johnson, parent Marcy Merrill and Ardy Potter, who handles detention and in-school suspension at Nome-Beltz. Also speaking in support of both Boyer and Sullivan were Nome Community Center director Lance Johnson, parent Paula Kennedy and community member Rahnia Parker. Join-

"I have given other interviews. I've been asked every time why I was not retained. I say, 'I don't know.'"

- Nome-Beltz assistant principal Doug Boyer

ing the chorus was the current high school student of the month, Brenda Evak, who had been lauded earlier in the meeting for her efforts to come back to school and start earning stellar grades as she moves toward graduation.

Chuck Fagerstrom also implored the board to bring some sort of resolution to the situation. "I've spoken to all of you [board members], and the more I listen the more confused I get," he said. "I feel it's about time that there's some type of leadership role pulled together by [board president] Gloria [Karmun] and Jon Wehde. Go into an executive session. Speak to your principal. Let them know. Jon, Gloria, grab the bull by the horn and get this thing settled."

As he has done each meeting, Boyer also stood to address the board. This time he presented a handful of letters of recommendation written by current school district employees among others. He recounted the difficulties in trying to obtain work elsewhere when he cannot tell potential employers why he was let go. "I have given other interviews. I've been asked every time why I was not retained. I say, 'I don't know," he said.

Boyer also noted how he wanted to reapply for his job, but faced uncertainty about the process. In a previous meeting Wehde had said he believed interviewing Sullivan or Boyer would constitute an act of insubordination on his part since the board had voted to not bring them back. Boyer asked the board for clarification on whether or not they would take such a view.

Later in the meeting, Nickels put the question to her fellow board members. McComas said he felt Nome-Beltz can function without an assistant principal at all and would want to see next year's budget more firmed up before making any decision on hiring. Board member Kirsten Timbers said she would want a legal opinion before making any comment on the matter. Member Heather Payenna said she did not want to answer the question at that moment and felt that a principal for the high school first needed to be hired before an assistant principal be considered.

Nickels then attempted to put the motion on the floor to give Boyer his job back. She was met with silence. "It appears you don't have a second, so [the motion] dies for a lack of a second," Board President Karmun said.

As of now, it is unknown who will be in the principal's office at either of large public school campuses. The one administrator the board did vote to retain has been on paid administrative leave since April 1 after it was discovered her administrative credentials had been revoked in California just as she started working in Nome last year. Biscotti's standing with Nome Public Schools is in limbo while a state board investigates her credentials.

At the May 11 meeting, Wehde reported that he had hired one new administrator while travelling to career fairs. Dr. David Keller, a former special education director for the district, will be returning to Nome as a principal in one of the schools while also handling special education. Wehde said in a telephone interview that he would be inclined to have Keller at the elementary school if the position opens.

Wehde said the process in determining Biscotti's eligibility to work for the district is currently paused. "There's a lot of checks and balances in the process," he said. "I don't have the ability to formally open that position."

In the meantime, Jon Berkeley from the district office has been standing in as the principal at Nome Elementary School.

Salary agreement

Beyond the savings realized by the new insurance figures, Martens could not give full details on how the budget would be altered to accommodate the raises on Monday. She was also unable to approximate how much it would cost the district to implement the raises. She did note, however, that the budget's bottom line would not change as a result of the agreement. "We will not be spending fund balance," she said. "We will have a balanced budget when we get this all done.'

Wehde along with school board members Barb Nickels and Albert McComas worked as the negotiating team for the district while the teachers were represented by Keith Conger, Corey Erickson and Kelly Thrun. The school board's approval of the agreement was unanimous May 18. McComas was not present at the meeting; however, he had recommended the board approved the deal during the May 11 meeting.

When negotiations opened in January, the gulf between what teachers wanted and what the district was willing to give was wide. Over the two rounds of direct negotiations held that month, the union held firm on asking for a total raise of 7 percent over the next two years.

over the two sessions, offering essentially a 1 percent raise each year for two years during the first round, and a 1.2 percent raise each year in the next. It was with that 1.2 percent raise in mind that the district built its initial budget.

Superintendent Wehde acknowledged the position from which teachers were bargaining. "The teachers' assessment of the cost of living in Nome cannot be questioned. These numbers reflect the cost differential between Anchorage and Nome," Wehde said of the proposed increases.

Nome to host 2014 Democratic statewide caucus

After a unanimous vote by party delegates at their statewide meeting in Sitka in early May, the Alaska Democratic Party has selected Nome as the site for its 2014 gathering.

District 39 party chair Louie Green Sr. said the statewide caucus is held every two years at various loations around the state time the event was hosted in Nome was 1990. Green said that caucus attracted somewhere around 200 delegates. "It was really successful compared to other ones," Green said.

The bi-annual caucus serves as the opportunity for the party to elect officers, set priorities, address the party platform and enact resolutions.

Representing the region at the meeting Nancy Green, Louie Green Sr., Dan Karmun and Ethel Karmum from Nome; Fran Degnan, Chuck Degnan, June Degnan and Art Ivanoff from Unalakleet.

The following resolutions submitted by representatives from the northern districts passed at the caucus:

• Requesting the Alaska Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development to fund villages level community buildings and public safety buildings

• Supporting the change of board composing the North Pacific Fishery Management Council to include tribal representatives

• Protection of Alaska Native subsistence activities including access to and takings of customary, traditional and cultural subsistence resources

• Requesting the State of Alaska to fund indigenous language education in public schools

 A call to amend the Magnuson-Stevens Act to establish the Arctic Fishery Management Council.

The district largely held its ground

In the 1940s, a woman's lifetime risk of breast cancer was one in 22. Today, her risk is one in 7. Many people diagnosed with breast cancer do not fit into a high-risk profile based on the known breast cancer risk factors. This means other factors—perhaps environmental—are at work. Mounting scientific evidence suggests that common chemicals found in our air, water, soil, food, homes, schools, and workplaces may contribute to breast cancer risk. Join us to find out about opportunities for prevention and ways to reduce your exposure to these chemicals.

The Silent Spring Institute is a non-profit organization dedicated to research into the preventable causes of breast cancer. It builds on a collaboration between activists and scientists who are dedicated to finding preventable causes of breast cancer.

Reading gets a macho makeover at Nome Elementary

"Guys Read" program gets fourth grade boys fired up about reading with manly books and fun

By Joy Hewitt

Last fall, the Nome Eskimo Community approached the Nome Elementary School principal with a proposal to launch a Guys Read program for fourth graders. This is a program that has taken off nationally, with a mission to motivate boys to read by connecting them with materials they will want to read, in ways they like to read. By teaming up with Nome Public Schools, Kegoyah Kozga Library, and Nome Literacy Council, Nome Eskimo Community organized the first (of hopefully, many) Guys Read program in Nome.

What do you mean, "Guys Read?" Next thing you'll be saying is that girls manage cities, and boys sing in theater productions. This is not news to children growing up in the 21st century...but still, Guys Read?

Well, according to the Center on Educational Policy (March 2010), boys have scored worse in reading than girls in every age group, in every year for the past 30 years. "Consistent with other recent research, our analysis of state test results by gender suggests that the most pressing issue related to gender gaps is the lagging performance of boys in reading." In fact, according to a study by Smith and Wilhelm (2002):

- Boys read less than girls read.
- Boys value reading as an activity less than girls do.
- Significantly more boys than girls declare themselves "nonreaders."
- Boys spend less time reading and express less enthusiasm for reading than girls do.
- Boys increasingly consider themselves to be "nonreaders' as they get older; very few designate themselves as such early in their schooling, but nearly 50 percent make that designation by high school.

Why is this? Why might boys be struggling with reading? Over the last several weeks, the Nome Eskimo Community has placed ads in the Nome Nugget, encouraging fathers to read with their sons. The Nome populace has been asked to make reading a part of their culture. Boys need positive role models for literacy. The majority of the Nome Elementary School teachers, aides and librarians involved in kids' reading are women. Boys may not see reading as masculine.

In January, Marsha Sloan of the Nome Eskimo Community, and Marguerite La Riviere of the Kogoyah Kozga Library contacted the Fairbanks Literacy Council. In 2009, the Fairbanks Literacy Council conducted a Guys Read program that served 540 fourth grade boys, and had 75 volunteers. Fairbanks Guys Read advocate Tim Stallard flew to Nome for the sole purpose of training men how to get boys excited about reading. By selecting boy-specific books and purchasing copies for the school library, Nome Eskimo Community set the process in motion. Several community volunteers (men, of course) came forward to lead the fourth grade boys in weekly reading sessions, held during lunch in the library. The volunteers often shared their love of reading with the kids, talking about some of their favorite reads, and inspiring the boys with stories of their childhood memories involving books. The volunteers then read aloud to the boys, trying (ineffectively) to keep them from laughing with a mouth full of school-cafeteria food. (ewwww...)

The Nome Guys Read program involved ALL the boys and got them excited about reading. When the volunteers demonstrate the positive side of reading, it lights a fire under even the most reluctant readers. Fourth grade teacher Sharon Penttila observed that her students "...could hardly wait for Guys Read. Across the board, they all liked it. And they were interested in the books that they got to read." Now don't think that the volunteers, themselves didn't have a bit of fun with this program. Lance Johnson, Lance Cannon, Jeremy Masters and Chip Leeper often became quite animated during the book presentations. "Man, that was fun reading with the kids," Leeper said after sharing "Salt Water Taffy" by Matthew Loux. When asked about the Guys Read program, several fourth grade boys piped up and said... "let's do it again next year!" One boy commented that he "...liked the books that were introduced during Guys Read." Now he looks for more books by the same authors.

The culminating activity was a Guys Read Party held May 12. In a single hour, the boys passed through several stations demonstrating their expertise in paper airplane folding, spit-wad shooting, and facial hair application. They settled down for the last 20 minutes with a cup of dirt cake to listen to their final book, "Choose Your Own Adventure: Secret of the Ninja." Nome Eskimo Community purchased a copy of this book for every fourth grader to take home and enjoy.

So don't be surprised to see boys reading for pleasure over the next several months. You may even want to box up the TV for the summer, and watch as the kids head down to the city library for more reading material. And remember, you can be a part of the solution. Kids need good role models.

Once a Nomeite...always a Nomeite

By Robert Tasso

As part of their 'First Friday' and 'Artist's Eye' events series, on May 7th the Anchorage Museum hosted Kathy Mallory, artist and longtime resident of the Bering Strait region. Kathy gave a gallery talk to a small group of museum patrons and art lovers about the various techniques she uses when painting Alaska's Northwest coast and its people. The artist spoke about the unique challenges of plein air oil painting, or painting on location, and made several references, of course, to the notorious wind and weather of the Seward Peninsula.

While living at Banner Creek just outside of Nome, Kathy would frequently travel around the region to Nome's outlying villages to paint and share her knowledge of art with children. While in Nome she taught through the Northwest Campus of the University of Alaska, focusing on Eskimo drawing.

She is a formally trained artist with a Bachelor's degree in fine arts from the Art Institute in Chicago, and is currently pursuing a Master's degree in Counseling and Art Therapy through Alaska Pacific University. She credits much of her artistic abilities as coming from studying other artists' work and techniques, years of experience, and being "self taught." Now she wants to put her talent to use teaching and inspiring others, and hopefully collecting a steady paycheck as a bonus.

Kathy "really enjoys capturing life and the imagery in Northwest Alaska." In years past, she has been the recipient of a Rasmussen Foundation individual artist award to paint village life, focusing much of her time on projects portraying life in Wales, Brevig Mission, and Teller. She has also received other grants and commissions for her work, and currently has two paintings in the Anchorage Museum, and one painting in the State Museum in Juneau. Kathy's next large art project will come in August when she travels to Savoonga, visiting their new school where she hopes to collaborate with village artists for a large painting, teaching and learning along the way.

Mallory lectured for about an hour as she displayed digitalized samples of her work on a large screen and some original paintings in a room filled with works by famed early Alaskan artist Sydney Laurence. She was pleasantly surprised to see a supportive audience filled with former Nomeites gathered in the Art of the North Gallery at the Anchorage Museum, hundreds of miles from where she usually sees them. Like Kathy herself, who now lives in Girdwood with her family, there were many former residents of Nome and the Bering Strait region in attendance, most of whom now live in the Anchorage area. In fact, there were so many former and present Nomeites relative to the size of the audience (around 20 out of 30) that it became a sort of spontaneous reunion, and a great show of support for a small Alaska town artist "done good" in the big city.

Upon realizing there were so many friends there, she immediately knew that in leaving the region, she didn't leave Alaska. "It was healing for me to see these people here," she said. It was clear that Nome had left an indelible impression on Kathy and many of these former Nomeites, and though each had their own reasons for leaving the region, all seemed to agree that "once a Nomeite...always

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor Julie Yoder Elmore, Community United Methodist Church On behalf of the Nome Ministerial Association Scripture Reference – Jeremiah

The past several months, my husband and I have preached a sermon series called "Promises, Prophets, and Prodigals: God at Work in the Old Testament." We preached on the stories of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Joshua, David, the kings, the wilderness, and the prophets. In this space, I would like to share with you a little about the prophets, specifically Jeremiah.

The role of the prophets in the Bible was to hold God's chosen people – the Israelites - accountable to living in a more right relationship with God. When God called someone to be a prophet, that someone did not necessarily feel that he or she was equipped to be a prophet. They tended to have excuses why they were not the right person for the job. In Jeremiah's case, Jeremiah thought he was too young to do the job that God had appointed to him from the time he was being formed in his mother's womb. God promised to be with him and touched Jeremiah's lips, giving Jeremiah the words he needed.

In his first set of oracles, Jeremiah sends a "trumpet call" to the people to stir them up and shock them into awareness of what could happen if their behavior continues. The people have taken for granted that they are secure and selfishly live the lives they want to live. Jeremiah calls them to turn their behavior around and focus on a right relationship with the One True God.

The poor behavior that the Judeans are exhibiting is that they "have gone after other gods to serve them" (Jer. 11:10). God says that God will "bring disaster upon them that they cannot escape; though they cry out to me, I will not listen to them. Then the cities of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem will go and cry out to the gods to whom they make offerings, but they will never save them in the time of their trouble." (Jer. 11:11-12) The Judean people have made altars to Baal who is a competing god whom the Israelite people were continually tempted to serve. Some sources say that Baal was known as the "giver of life." Wouldn't you be tempted if you were them? It would be easy to take for granted the one true God who chose us, loves us and takes care of us.

What do we make into gods today? Do we want more material possessions, thinking that if we have the latest and greatest piece of technology, we will be happy? Do we rely on ourselves instead of the One True God who is the real giver of life and all that we have? From what behavior do we need to repent and put our total trust in the God who chose us, loves us and takes care of us? The answers may surprise you. God may be calling you to be a prophet.

Too close to call

Unofficial numbers have Karmun and Nickels keeping seats and McComas losing his. Timbers' and Payenna's fate unknown as of press time.

By Tyler Rhodes

In a vote that many hoped would bring some closure to a rift that has been tearing at the community for months, uncertainty remained after initial tallies were counted at Tuesday's recall election for the entire Nome Board of Education.

With 27 ballots that were either questioned or otherwise unable to be counted left to tally as of press time Tuesday night, unofficial results showed that Board President Gloria Karmun and member Barb Nickels should retain their seats. If the unofficial numbers hold, Albert McComas will be recalled. The numbers for the remaining two members, Kirsten Timbers and Heather Payenna, were favoring recall but were ultimately too close to call for certain as of press time.

"Like I've said from the beginning, this is democracy in play and the majority rules. The people have spoken," Karmun said minutes after the tentative numbers were announced at Old St. Joe's Hall around 9 p.m. Tuesday.

Voters were essentially deadlocked on Timbers, with 475 voting to recall and 473 voting to keep her on the board. Payenna has a bit of a larger gap to overcome with 479 voting to recall and 467 voting to retain. The remaining ballots left to be counted as of Tuesday night could have kept both members in their seats.

Karmun received 491 votes to be retained and 447 to be recalled. Nickels received 578 to be retained and 360 to be recalled. McComas received 491 to be recalled and 463 to be retained. Even if all 27 outstanding ballots were to have been valid and in his favor, McComas would have still been one vote shy of dodging the recall.

Karmun, who was the sole board member to be at Old St. Joe's as the ballots were counted, said the wait-

Council approves schools' $1.8 million request

City council members also field requests for funding shooting range and bowling alley upgrades

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council allocated $1.8 million of municipal funds to Nome Public Schools for FY 2011 during a meeting on Monday. Slightly more than $1 million of the funds are mandated by state law, and the City of Nome contributed an additional $791,674.

This year the Nome Board of Education re-

This year the Nome Board of Education requested only $67,000 more in additional funds than in FY 2010, Doug Boyer, assistant principal at Nome-Beltz High School told council members before they granted the budget request. He said the funding will allow implementation of a new strategic plan for the district.

In other business, council members approved the first readings of two proposed ordinances and scheduled them for second readings, public hearings and final action at the next regular council meeting.

One of the proposed ordinances would authorize disposal of municipal property by lease to the U.S. Coast Guard to install two range marker lights for safe navigation of the entrance to the Nome harbor. The front range light would be located in lot 64A, block 57 off Seppala Drive, and the rear range light would be placed on a parcel adjacent to West I Street between the Nome Cemetery and blocks 102 and 134.

The Coast Guard would lease approximately 400 square feet at each site for one year with 19 successive one-year leases at the Coast Guard's option. The property value of the two parcels is estimated at $30,000. The Coast Guard would pay $1 during the entire term of the lease. Councilman Stan Andersen requested detailed descriptions of the range marker lights, including their size and the way their lights will function. The other proposed ordinance would amend Chapter 11.50 of the Nome Code of Ordinances to adopt provisions required by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The definition of "development" in Section 11.50.060 would be amended to read: "Development means any man-made change to improved or unimproved real estate, including but not limited to buildings or other structures, mining, dredging, filling,

Teachers' approval cements salary deal

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome's teachers put the final punctuation mark on salary negotiations between their union and the district when the majority of the district's educators approved a three-year deal last week.

The teachers' 40-5 approval vote came on the heels of a Nome Board of Education meeting held May 18 where it gave a unanimous blessing to the agreement. Negotiators for the board and the Nome Education Association struck the mediated deal May 11 to give teachers a 2 percent raise next year, a 3 percent raise for 2011-2012 and a 2.5 percent increase in 2012-2013.

The agreement came after the two sides succeeded in establishing salaries for only the first year of a three-year contract last year. This most recent round of salary negotiations started in January and initially aimed at squaring away figures for the next two years.

In two rounds of direct negotiations, the teachers held firm asking for a 7 percent raise spread out over the two years. The school district initially offered 1 percent each year and then came back with a 1.2 percent raise each year in the second round. The failure of either side to offer significant ground in the direct negotiations spurred the entrance of the mediator in the process.

The federally funded mediator was able to hammer out the deal after one round of talks, adding one more year to the agreement. The new salary agreement will extend all other pro-

Dear Editor,

Title: Dopey Mushers

ITC has reported that a couple Iditarod mushers have tested positive for THC. ITC will not disclose the identities of the two dopey mushers. The reason for this is because they are in the good old boy network receiving special privileges and double standards. You can take it to the bank, that if they were women, Natives or other minorities who tested positive on their drug test, ITC would hang them out to dry. This is not the right way, but the white way. It is ITC's different strokes, for different folks.

The next thing that ITC does not have is drug-testing transparency for the dogs on the trail. No one is allowed to see the drug test results. Why is that? How does anyone know that the dogs are in fact drug tested? The greyhound and sled dog committees in the lower 48 allow everyone to see their drug test results. How can dopey mushers provide human care for their dogs on the Iditarod Trail? It has always been said that some mushers hallucinate out on the Iditarod trail. Now we

Fighting the Fight

Cancer is an insidious predator that impacts the lives of many of us in western Alaska. It attacks us from our environment, our living habits and our family tree. The American Cancer Society's Relay for Life event this past weekend in Nome made us aware of the wide spectrum of cancer and its far-reaching effects in our community. It touches all of us and the incidence of cancer in western Alaska is too high.

Oh, cancer is a formidable beast but it can be beaten. It's a tough adversary, but as the years pass we make progress. Research into stem cells, DNA, chemistry, physiology and behavior modification has made an impact on our treatment of cancer. Both private and government sponsored research are part of the battle plan, and this takes dedication, skill and money. We have to dig down into our pockets and pull up some bucks for research. We can do this. We can come together as a community and even in these tough economic times Nomeites can come through and give our time and money.

This past week Nomeites got together and proved that we could do the Relay for Life fundraiser and have fun while we were doing it.

Congratulations to the class of 2010

Red Dog gets permit to expand mine

The Army Corps of Engineers last week issued a permit to Teck Cominco's Red Dog Mine that allows the mining company to proceed with the development of a new pit called the Aqqaluk deposit. Teck Alaska has the necessary permits and authorizations in place to develop Aqqaluk. However, Red Dog is out of compliance for water discharge limits. The company said it is a limit on total dissolved solids and cannot feasibly be met through any existing treatment technology at the volumes being discharged. If the mine stays out of compliance it could face actions from the Environmental Protection Agency. The water discharge issue has no bearing on the development of Aqqaluk. Red Dog is a zinc, lead and silver mine northwest of Kotzebue and developed on NANA regional corporation land. The mine employs more than 500 workers.

Bills continue to pile up on Governor's desk

Last week, legislators were still working on passing bills. While Governor Sean Parnell still has not signed the capital budget – or made public which projects got struck the House passed a concurrent resolution to speed up the in-state gas line. Rep. Jay Ramras (R-Fairbanks) sponsored the bill that asked the state to assist the project to secure needed permits, rights-of-way, engineering specifications and in all other ways to act in due haste to move the instate natural gas pipeline to a construction phase. Another House action sponsored by Rep. Mike Hawker asked the governor to exercise all legal options to restrain the United States Department of the Interior and the National Park Service, from intruding on the sovereign right of the state to exercise jurisdiction over navigable water and submerged land. The House Resources committee also sponsored a bill to support mining and processing of rare earth elements in Alaska and to stockpile them. Rare earth elements are used for military applications as well as green technologies. According to the bill's sponsor Rep. Craig Johnson (R-District 28) "you can't go green without good old fashioned mining" and the resolution's purpose is to urge the United States Congress to pass H.R. 4866, to restart the rare earth mining industry in the US.

Senators seek to kill duck stamps

Irking subsistence hunters Alaska wide, the US Fish and Wildlife Service said it would enforce the law that requires subsistence hunters to purchase and carry duck stamps when hunting or gathering the eggs of bird. Last week, Senators Lisa Murkowski and Mark Begich introduced legislation that would eliminate the need to duck stamps. Murkowski/Begich bill would amend the Fish and Wildlife Improvement Act of 1978 to remove this requirement on Alaskans who take birds or eggs for subsistence purposes. The senators called the law overly burdensome and argued that if exemptions are made for crops or population management, then exception could also be made to protect traditional ways of Native life.

The bill is on its way to the Environment and Public Works Commit-

Little girl mauled

NAPASKIAK(AP)—Authorities say a three-year-old girl has been killed by a dog in the village of Napaskiak in southwest Alaska. Alaska State Troopers say Krystal Brink wandered into a dog yard last week and was mauled. According to troopers, the girl had been playing outside a home with other children. The dog's owner had his dog team tied up when she wandered into the yard. In response to the mauling, a member of Brink's family became upset and shot all seven dogs tied in the yard. Brink's body was sent to Anchorage for an autopsy. The girl and her family were visiting from Kasigluk.

MMS director apologizes for faux pas

In response to a New York Times story revealing that the Alaska office of the Minerals Management Service suppressed scientists and scientific reports, violated environmental policies, and served a cake topped with the words "Drill Baby, Drill," the head of the office yesterday apologized...for the cake. Alaska Regional Director John Goll allowed the cake to be served at an all-staff meeting he called to discuss Interior Secretary Ken Salazar's decision to reform the agency in the wake of the Gulf oil spill disaster and a rapidly growing scandal caused by what President Obama describes as the agency's "too cozy" relationship with the offshore oil industry.

The head of MMS's Alaska region since 1997, Goll recently approved Shell Alaska's plan to begin exploratory drilling in the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas this July. Goll said in the email that the "drill, baby, drill" was meant to take light of the words. His e-mail said, "This was simply wrong to have. I failed in preventing this from happening in my office."

Aquaculture hearing held in Anchorage

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration held a listening session in Anchorage last week to hear input from Alaskans regarding a new national aquaculture policy. In testimony, state officials voiced concerns about maintaining protection of wild stocks and avoiding environmental damage. They also warned of potential economic harm to fishery-dependent communities should offshore aquaculture be authorized on a broad scale. Governor Parnell led the slew of officials to request a moratorium on new offshore aquaculture. The state is requesting that coastal states have the

Democrats say sign budget first, fundraise later

The Alaska Democratic Party drafted an open letter to Governor Sean Parnell, saying he further erodes public faith in the office as he mentions the capital budget of $3.1 billion at private fundraisers for his gubernatorial election campaign. Chair Patti Higgins said in the letter that while it is not illegal, it is improper that voters have only limited opportunity to interact with Parnell as he's still mulling the budget, while donors and fundraisers have access to him to lobby for their projects. Higgins urged Parnell to stop holding fundraisers until the budget has passed, to release the names of people who attended fundraisers and to return the money raised from donors who are beneficiaries of the capital budget.

grading, paving, excavation or drilling operation or storage equipment or materials located within the area of the flood hazard." Section 5.10.050(b) would be amended to read: "A floodplain development permit is required for any development in an area of special flood hazard as defined in Section 11.50.060."

The council adopted a resolution setting the compensation for election personnel for the 2010 Nome Municipal School Board Special Recall Election at $10 per hour for the election chair and $9.50 per hour for election clerks.

The council approved the appointment of Campbell Kristenson to the Nome Port Commission, as requested by Mayor Denise Michels. Kristenson is employed by Crowley Petroleum Distribution and has resided in Nome for 30 years.

Michels drew attention to a communication from the U.S. Postal Service announcing that Savoonga was selected as a designated postal mail hub on May 1 following a one-year public notice period. Savoonga was removed from the Nome regional hub and became an additional hub in the region. Gambell was reassigned from the Nome hub as a destination to be served out of the new hub at Savoonga.

Draft 2011 budget reviewed

Controller Cussy Kauer presented an overview of the City's draft FY 2011 general fund budget to council members in an hour-long work session Monday preceding their regular meeting. Following are several options she outlined for the council to consider.

Noting that a budget line item titled Nome Joint Utilities-PILOT for $250,000 is the same from year to year, Kauer asked whether council members want to consider changes in the allocation. Councilwoman

Mary Knodel proposed using part of the NJU PILOT funds to give volunteers for the fire and ambulance departments who plug in their vehicles at home during cold periods a $100 per month credit on their utility bill to thank them for their service.

Kauer estimated that volunteer fire and ambulance crews number about 60 individuals, adding that some of them may serve on both forces. She asked Knodel how many months each volunteer would receive a utility bill credit. Knodel noted that Nome is cold for about six months of the year. Councilman Stan Andersen said it would be simpler to pay the volunteers than to reimburse them by crediting their utility bills.

Revenues from landfill maintenance fees have increased this year because the landfill has collected a lot more tariffs for soils disposal, Kauer reported. Noting that construction of the new hospital and the removal of contaminated soils and towers at the former Anvil Mountain White Alice site will produce large quantities of debris, she asked whether construction contractors can contribute in any way except landfill fees. Public Works personnel have suggested that a bulldozer would be useful at the landfill, she added.

Kauer suggested that council members consider whether to continue renting the child care building (Gold Hill Tutit Ininat) or sell it for the assessed value. The building's tenants pay $90,000 per year in rent, but the City gains only $20,000 after operating costs are deducted, she noted. Kauer said the tenants are talking about remodeling the building and have cited water temperature issues. If the tenants were to buy the building, they would save money in the long run, and proceeds from the sale might benefit the City more than $20,000 in annual rental profits, she added.

Police Chief John Papasodora would like to add an administrative assistant to his staff as part of the move to the new public safety building, Kauer noted. She said the police department wants two new vehicles at a cost of about $40,000 each, and if they are approved a couple of current police vehicles will become excess property. The animal control officer has her eye on one of them, she added.

The council received three requests by letter and e-mail to include funds for specific purposes in the City's FY 2011 budget. A request from Lance Johnson, director of the Nome Community Center for $10,000 for the Nome Food Bank made it into the draft budget. Bruce Klein, treasurer of the Nome Sportsman Association, asked the City for $25,000 to help develop the Sunset Firing Range, but his request was received too late to include in the draft budget. Nome businessman Matt Tomter asked the council to budget funds to repair, upgrade and operate the bowling alley at the Nome Recreation Center.

During the meeting on Monday, Tomter noted that the council wants a request for proposals to operate the bowling alley. "I doubt it is commercially viable or it would not have been operated by the City in the first place," he said. "Ask the people at the Rec Center to show you how they can do it."

Nome residents Lisa Wehde, Mari Lammer, Robin and Doug Johnson, Mike Quinn, Paul Kosto and Jim Adams also asked the council to provide funds to reopen and operate the bowling alley.

Steve Smith, president of the Nome Sportsman Association, told council members his group needs $25,000 to develop the Sunset Firing Range after they receive permission from the landowners, Bering Straits Native Corp. Andersen said the association needs to explain what it did with $5,000 from the City's current budget. Smith said three shooting benches and a target board have been installed and funds have been allocated for a 40-foot storage van.

Smith called on Klein as treasurer to provide more details. Klein said the association has purchased $2 million of liability insurance and expects to buy a container van after it arrives in Nome from Seattle. Smith said shooting lanes need to be reoriented 90 degrees to point away from fuel storage tanks.

In his letter to the council, Klein said the association wants to increase the number of shooting lanes from one to four, varying in length from 50 yards to 200 yards. "The funding would help with the rental of dozer equipment, fuel, gravel and building enclosed target shelters," he added.

"You need a 10-year business plan," Andersen said.

Klein said the National Rifle Association is willing to donate $25,000 per year to the association if it has a 10-year lease agreement on land used for the firing range.

Andersen told Klein he has two to three weeks to prepare a funding proposal for the City's FY 2011 budget. Councilman Jerald Brown asked that $25,000 for the firing range be included in the next revision of the draft budget. He also requested cost estimates for the proposed bowling alley upgrade and operation.

The council agreed to meet June 11 at noon for a follow-up work session on the FY 2011 general fund budget. All council members except Jon Larson attended the meeting.

Upcoming events

The Bering Strait Leadership Team will host a public reception for Congressman Don Young, Lori Hamamoto, Katherine Gottlieb, Dr. Ted Mala and Dr. Marjorie Mau June 1 from 6 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. at the Pioneer Hall. For more information, call Pamela Cushman at 443-4322.

The Department of Transportation and Public facilities is seeking public input on two projects at the Nome Airport—a master plan to guide development of the airport for the next 20 years and a runway safety area expansion project. DOTPF personnel will provide updates on the project and take public input at an open house June 2 from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. at Old St. Joseph's Hall. Presentations will begin at 5:30 p.m.

Knodel asked Michels whether the City has told DOTPF it does not favor an alternative to move the Snake River as part of the runway expansion project.

"Yes," Michels replied.

"We don't want them to move the Snake River because there goes the small boat harbor and the port entrance," Knodel said. "They have survey people here talking about rerouting the river."

DOTPF Commissioner Leo von Scheben and members of his staff plan to discuss Nome's proposed new state office building on June 9 from 1:30 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. in the City Hall council chambers, Michels said. Bering Straits Native Corp. officials recently sent a letter to von Scheben asking him to meet with Nome's residents, businesses and institutions about the department's decision to purchase new office building property away from downtown Nome.

The Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center will host a recognition ceremony to honor the late Rep. Richard Foster for his service and hard work in support of vocational education for rural Alaskans June 7 from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m. at NACTEC House.

The City of Nome received an invitation to attend a decommissioning ceremony for the U.S. Coast Guard LORAN Station at Port Clarence June 17 at noon. A reception will follow the ceremony. L TIER II Reporting

The Nome LEPC is presenting government agencies and private entities in the Bering Straits Region with information related to Tier II reporting requirements. This is in accordance with federal regulations in Title III of the Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act of 1986, Section 312, Public Law 99499, codified at 42 U.S.C. Section 11022. The Act is also known as SARA Title III.

Annual Tier II reports are required by organizations that maintain a physical inventory of applicable hazardous chemicals in quantities that are equal to or exceed threshold limits. Some organizations are exempt from reporting requirements per SARA Title III or other federal regulations. All organizations are exempt for inventory below threshold limits.

Tier II reporting provides specific information to the public, local government (including the Fire Department), and state government, about hazardous chemicals present at your facility at any time during the year. Complete reporting includes submitting a copy of the Materials Safety Data Sheet (MSDS) for all chemicals that meet threshold limits.

Your organization may receive a letter in the next few weeks. Detailed information and instructions will be included in the packet. If you do not receive a letter, please contact the Nome LEPC by calling (907)443-7824 if you have any questions as to whether or not your organization may be required to submit annual inventory reports in accordance with the Act.

Thank you for your time and consideration. Please call the Nome LEPC Coordinator at (907)443-7824 for any questions or concerns.

Tribal governments call to stop exploratory drilling

Massive Gulf of Mexico spill prompts tribal entities to ask for halting of Chukchi, Beaufort projects

By Diana Haecker

In response to the unfolding environmental disaster in the Gulf of Mexico caused by the unchecked flow of crude oil from a deep-sea oil well, the Native village of Point Hope IRA and other Alaska tribal governments sent off letters asking Secretary of the Interior Ken Salazar to call off offshore oil exploration in the Chukchi and Beaufort seas.

The letter says that drilling in the Beaufort and Chukchi seas this summer would be an "irresponsible gamble with our precious natural resources."

The resistance comes as Shell

Oil is readying drill ships and support vessels to be sent to the Chukchi Sea and the Beaufort Sea to begin exploratory drilling for oil and gas this summer.

The Alaska Intertribal Council, a tribally governed nonprofit organization that advocates in support of tribal governments throughout the state, has thrown its weight behind the call from the Point Hope IRA to press Salazar to stop all OCS drilling. The AITC had in the past also passed resolutions opposing offshore drilling and protecting the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge 1002 area from drilling.

Earlier this month, the village of Point Hope IRA had asked for support from other Alaska Native tribal governments to halt offshore continental shelf exploration and drilling. The letter says, "As a unified front, we call for a halt to all exploratory drilling in the Arctic until the government has answers about what happened to the Deepwater Horizon exploratory drill rig and can guarantee that no such catastrophe could happen in our garden, the Arctic Ocean."

According to Brad Garness, AITC executive director, the organization's fax machines are full with letters coming back signed from tribal governments, including the village of White Mountain, Little Diomede IRA, Shishmaref IRA, the Gwichin and Kongiganak Traditional Council. Garness told The Nome Nugget that the letter is more than just a comment to Salazar. "This is not a comment, it's our lives that are at stake here," he said.

In the wake of the Deepwater Horizon explosion and the uncontrolled oil spill that keeps on spewing into the Gulf of Mexico, Secretary Salazar had conceded that there is shared responsibility between government, the Minerals Management Service, and the oil and gas industry. He also proposed to divide the roles of MMS by splitting its regulatory function from the revenue-collecting arm.

Meanwhile, Congress tries to find out in hearings what went wrong and senators and government officials flock to Louisiana to tour the disaster sites and to get firsthand looks at the oil contamination reaching shorelines. Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski said that she had introduced a measure to in-

UAF to study king salmon declines on Yukon, Kuskokwim

By Laurie McNicholas

Scientists at the University of Alaska Fairbanks will begin a two-year study of the declines and variability in king salmon runs on the Yukon and Kuskokwim river systems this summer, reports the UAF School of Fisheries and Ocean Sciences.

The study does not include rivers systems in the Norton Sound region.

"The project contains multiple components, all focused on the health and ecology of freshwater king salmon runs and how these factors affect annual returns," states a press release from the SFOS. "One aspect will examine how king salmon grow during their freshwater phase growth affects survival to the age of reproduction. Another component will study how infection by a parasite called 'Ichthyophonus' affects the health of freshwater-run king salmon. Although not harmful to humans, Ichthyophonus attacks the organs of the fish and causes reduced endurance and ability to spawn.'

"The Ichthyophonus part of the study will look at Yukon River salmon, especially looking at Tanana River king salmon," added Carin Stephens, SFOS information officer in an e-mail response to questions from The Nome Nugget. "The growth component of the study will take place on four river systems, two from the Yukon River system (the Andreafsky River and the Chena River) and two from the Kuskokwim River system (the Kwethluk River and the Kotrugluk River)."

The Pollock Conservation Cooperative Research Center, which is part of the SFOS, provided $435,000 for the project, according to the SFOS press release. Led by professor Milo Adkison and assistant professor Larissa Dehn, the study includes a consortium of UAF fisheries faculty members from both Fairbanks and Juneau. Assistant professor Megan McPhee received $180,000 in matching funds from the Alaska Sustainable Salmon Fund to augment the study.

The PCCRC is funded by the Pollock Conservation Cooperative, a group of Bering Sea pollock catcher/processor companies. PCC companies include American Seafoods Co., Arctic Storm, Glacier Fish Co., Starbound and Trident Seafoods Corp. Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the Western Alaska Community Development Program, owns 37.5 percent of Glacier Fish Co. The PCC has donated more than $10 million to UAF over the last 10 years.

"The fishing industry is greatly concerned about recent declines in Western Alaska salmon abundance," said Denis Wiesenburg, dean of the SFOC and director of the research center. "As a result, the PCCRC decided to direct significant funding this year to meaningful, focused research into the causes of these declines."

The PCCRC annually awards grants to University of Alaska faculty members and other scientists to study North Pacific marine and coastal ecosystems, fisheries and marine mammals, according to the SFOS press release. This year, the center requested that proposals address issues of salmon health, ecology and migration.

Plan prioritizes commercial pollock over subsistence salmon

Editor's note: The following is a press release from the Association of Village Council Presidents, Bering Sea Fishermen's Association, Kawerak Inc., Tanana Chiefs Conference and Yukon River Drainage Fisheries Association.

Secretary of Commerce Gary Locke approved a plan proposed by the North Pacific Fishery Management Council to manage Chinook salmon bycatch in the Bering Sea pollock fishery on May 19. The plan, called Amendment 91, allows the pollock fishery to catch up to 47,591 Chinook salmon in any year, and up to 60,000 Chinook salmon in any two out of seven years without penalty if they participate in an industry run "incentive plan.

Groups throughout Western Alaska endorsed a lower cap including the Association of Village Council Presidents (AVCP), the Alaska Federation of Natives, Tanana Chiefs Conference (TCC), Kawerak, the Western and Eastern Interior Regional Subsistence Advisory Councils, the Federal Subsistence Board, the Alaska Board of Fisheries, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the U.S. Department of State and the Yukon River Panel.

"Amendment 91 completely ignores the unanimous recommendations from across Western Alaska for a cap of around 30,000 Chinook salmon," said Myron Naneng, AVCP president. "Western Alaskan tribes as well as those responsible for managing our fisheries in-river spoke loudly and clearly, but our requests fell on deaf ears to both the Council and the Secretary of Commerce.'

The Bering Sea pollock fishery catches Chinook salmon as bycatch while fishing for pollock. These are the same salmon whose return we await each year, including those from the Yukon and Kuskokwim Rivers, Bristol Bay and Norton Sound, as well as Cook Inlet and the Pacific Northwest. These salmon cannot be retained by the pollock fishery and therefore must

"It's irresponsible to leave the management of our precious salmon resources to an industry that just a few years ago, when regulatory measures were relaxed, caught over 120,000 Chinook salmon in one year."

- Loretta Bullard, Kawerak president either be thrown back into the water—dead after hours in the nets—or saved for donation to food banks. In 2007, the pollock fishery caught over 120,000 Chinook salmon as bycatch, in contrast to the 10-year average (1997-2006) of 43,328. According to recent estimates over 50 percent of the Chinook salmon caught as bycatch are bound for Western Alaska.

Low returns of Chinook salmon throughout Western Alaska have caused severe economic distress in recent years as subsistence harvests are restricted and small commercial fisheries are eliminated. The Yukon River Chinook salmon fishery was declared a fishery disaster for the 2008 and 2009 seasons by the Secretary of Commerce. "It is beyond unjust that the pollock fishery will be allowed to continue catching Chinook salmon virtually without limits offshore while inriver families sit on the banks watching their food and income swim by," said Becca Robbins Gisclair, policy director for the Yukon River Drainage Fisheries Association. "This conservation burden should not be borne by rural residents, commercial and sport fishers alone.'

The 60,000 upper limit approved in Amendment 91 has only been exceeded three times in the past 18 years, and essentially preserves the status quo. Even the 47,591 cap in essence preserves the long-term average bycatch. "Amendment 91 does little more than preserve the pollock fishery's current bycatch numbers," said Karen Gillis, executive director of the Bering Sea Fishermen's Association. "The Council and National Marine Fisheries Service missed an opportunity and their obligation to actually reduce bycatch, not just put the current numbers in regulation. All that has been accomplished here is to put the current numbers in regulation."

Amendment 91 relies on a system of industry run incentive plans to reduce bycatch below the stated cap levels. However, the plans operate outside of Council/agency control with no guarantees of bycatch reduction. The plans have changed already from what was presented to the Council when they voted to approve Amendment 91 last April.

"By relying on industry incentive plans as the primary means of bycatch reduction, the Council and NMFS have once again allowed industry to self regulate," said Loretta Bullard, president of Kawerak. "We've seen how well this has worked for the banking and oil industries. It's irresponsible to leave the management of our precious salmon resources to an industry that just a few years ago, when regulatory measures were relaxed, caught over 120,000 Chinook salmon in one year."

A coalition of Western Alaska groups had asked the Secretary to reject Amendment 91 because it did not meet NMFS's legal requirements to reduce bycatch, nor the needs of subsistence users, nor the United States' obligations under the Yukon River Salmon Agreement, an international treaty with Canada.

'In approving Amendment 91, the Obama Administration has chosen to prioritize the economic interests of the pollock fishery over the needs of salmon users throughout the state," said Jerry Isaac, TCC president. "In doing so they've ignored an overwhelming message from Alaska's tribal governments that the bycatch reduction measures of Amendment 91 will not provide our people and Chinook salmon populations with the protection they need and deserve. This is a very sad day for our Chinook salmon and the people who depend on them."

crease the liability cap of oil companies. In an interview with this reporter, she said that different formulas are in discussion. Among them are taxing the profits from the four last consecutive quarters of a company. Another model would give the president the power to set a liability cap taking different risk factors into account.

The Interior Department said last week that offshore drilling decisions about permitting are on hold until at least the end of May. Shell Oil's proposals to the MMS were to drill up to three exploration wells in the Chukchi Sea and two exploration wells in Camden Bay in the Beaufort Sea this summer.

The MMS estimates that the Chukchi Sea holds 15 billion barrels of recoverable oil and 76 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. Only five exploration wells have ever been drilled there. Shell spent $84 million in 2005 and 2007 buying MMS leases in the Beaufort, and in 2008 spent $2.1 billion for exploration rights in the Chukchi Sea. On its website Shell lays out its spill response research and goes as far as saying that ice could actually help in containing a spill. Shell said that international scientists working under a Norwegian Institute spent two weeks in May 2009 in the pack ice in the Norwegian Barents Sea to study the behavior of oil spills in Arctic waters, and to test various response options in realistic oil-in-ice conditions. Shell maintains that those field tests demonstrated that ice-infested seas could actually be helpful in confining a spill and acting as a natural boom and protective barrier.

However, Garness of the AITC is not convinced. "I'm 100 percent certain that there is no technology available to clean up a spill in the Arctic," he said. "When I see science that says it's easy and possible, I realize the old adage that says, 'He who buys the piper calls the tune.'

Garness offered the point of view that questions the rush. "We know that there is only a fixed number of barrels of oil in this earth. And like any other commodity, when less is available, the more it's worth. If we wait seven generations, our children will be better educated and they will know better how to use that oil.'

Quitting smoking: Which therapy is most effective?

Bob Lawrence, MD

What would you do to stop a killer? Smoking is the number one cause of preventable premature death in the United States and a growing threat to rural Alaska where smoking rates are now twice the national average.

Smoking cessation is the only true cure for many diseases. Of all the medication available to treat heart disease, hypertension, high cholesterol, emphysema, aortic aneurysm, acute myeloid leukemia, bladder cancer, pancreatic cancer, stomach cancer, stomach ulcers, and periodontal disease, no treatment is powerful enough to counteract the detrimental effects of smoking tobacco

No one pretends that quitting tobacco use is easy. The Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) has compared tobacco dependence to cocaine, amphetamine, or opiate addictions. The addictive ingredient in tobacco is nicotine, a powerful stimulant that causes a different type of addiction involving a psychological addiction as well as a physical dependence. Tobacco use is associated chemically in the brain with activities and relationships that are pleasant, healthy, and good. This association deceptively makes smoking feel beneficial when in reality, according to the CDC, it harms every organ in your body.

Successful treatment of tobacco use must address both sides of the addiction: physical dependence and psychological dependence. Some people are able to address both issues with a mere decision to quit. Others require a combination of supportive counseling, nicotine replacement, and medication that counteracts the craving for tobacco. Research suggests that successful cessation occurs in groups such as family members, friends, or co-workers who agree to quit together.

Nicotine replacement therapies (NRT) allay the physical symptoms of withdrawal and are available over-the-counter in the form of patches, gums,

Two medications, bupropion (Zyban) and varenicline (Chantix) are approved by the FDA to block tobacco cravings. These medications are only available by prescription Studies sponsored by pharmaceutical companies show NRT can improve chances of stopping smoking by 50-70 percent, at least in the short term. However, real world experience shows that nicotine replacement or medication alone for smoking cessation only helps a few people in the long run. A large review published in 2003 in the journal Tobacco Control showed that after six months only 7 percent of smokers who used a nicotine replacement therapy remained smoke-free whereas 93 percent resumed smoking.

More recently, a head-to-head study comparing the efficacy of bupropion and several NRT therapies published in the Archives of General Psychiatry in January 2010 showed that only a combination of the nicotine patch supplemented with lozenges had any effect on abstinence after six months. The patch alone and all other therapies used in the study were no more effective than taking a placebo. Interestingly, 22 percent of people taking the placebo were smoke free after six months, suggesting the mere decision to quit was a powerful step in smoking cessation.

This does not mean medical therapy for smoking cessation is unhelpful. Successful quitters, including those who use NRT or medication, just have one more important component in common, namely a decision to quit. According to the CDC, if you ask a group of successful quitters what method they used to quit smoking, over 90 percent will say they quit "cold turkey" or slowly tapered their use without medication.

No medication can replace the will of a person motivated to stop using tobacco. Medical professionals know that successful smoking cessation always starts with a personal decision. No pill, patch, or therapy is as effective as a person simply making a decision to quit.

Once the decision is made, patients have many resources available for information and trained guidance on available therapies. Alaska's Tobacco Quit Line 1-800-QUIT-NOW (784-8669) is available from 4 a.m.-11 p.m. daily. The Norton Sound Regional Hospital CAMP department (907-443-3365) has trained cessation coaches and information on NRT. Patients may also discuss personal options for smoking cessation therapy with their

To a medical provider, it is heartbreaking to see this decision postponed until a first heart attack, stroke, or suspicious lesion appears. Living in rural Alaska calls for a certain amount of toughness. It is difficult to watch tough people lose their strength over the years due to a substance like tobacco. But the problem is totally preventable with a firm decision to quit. So when it comes to smoking cessation, don't just try. Decide.

New chiropractor locates practice in Nome

Sore backs, stiff necks and all the crinks that needed to be worked out after a long dark winter are set to be gone with the arrival of spring and Dr. Craig Brummert.

Dr. Brummert is a chiropractor working through Natural Health Chiropractic. His office is in the Federal Building on the east side of the lobby. He is a graduate of New York Chiropractic College in Seneca Falls, New York.

He has lived in several small towns from Pennsylvania, to Virginia, New York, California and Oklahoma. Since he loves the outdoors and hunting and fishing he was undaunted by an ad from Dr. Todd Lovell. "After his multiple attempts to scare me away, which only made me more interested in Nome, he decided that I would be a good fit for the practice, said Brummert Unfortunately, I had to wait until February to take the Alaska State Board exam. I arrived in Fairbanks and spent a week with Dr. Todd and his family while becoming familiar with his practice systems. Then I came to Nome via Sitka, Juneau, and Anchorage.

"When I first arrived I started playing hockey on Wednesdays and Fridays. That ended quickly with the 'warm' weather. I'm not exactly sure what I'm going to get into just yet, but there is a good chance it will involve heath and wellness, sports, and the outdoors. I'll leave the politics to my predecessor." He also likes to read and to play the banjo.

Congratulations!

Truong Phan graduated with honors, summa cum laude, on May 15 and received a Doctorate of Optometry from the University of Houston College of Optometry.

Happy 95th Birthday Gram! From all your family in Nome!

Obituaries

Lloyd F. "Stinky" Hardy

On May 9 Lloyd Franklin "Stinky" Hardy died peacefully in his sleep of a massive heart attack at his beloved fish camp on the Bering Sea coast – a place that he had flown over countless times in his 25.000 hours of flight time.

Stinky was born June 7, 1948 in Kotzebue to Josephine (Lane) and Russell M. Hardy. He was soon brought to Nome to make it home his entire life. Growing up, Stinky always knew the value of hard work, whether it be sweeping floors at Harwood's Nome Pharmacy or collecting honey buckets for Elmer Straub. He played on the Nome state championship basketball team in high school, became an Eagle Scout and attended the National Boy Scout Jamboree in Valley Forge, PA.

Stinky was drawn to flying at an early age and got his private, commercial and ATR pilot licenses in Renton, WA. He flew for Munz Northern Airlines, Foster Aviation and later started Seward Peninsula Flying Service in 1975. His aviation career was interrupted in 1968-1969 as he served honorably in Vietnam. He later flew for family owned businesses in Kiana, Kotzebue, Dillingham and Naknek and enjoyed recovering WWII airplanes across the

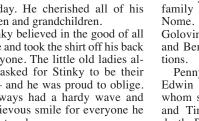

In later years he spent time in Valdez with his sister Tweet, working at the Safety Roadhouse during Iditarod for Chuck Reader and with his son Russ in the construction business around the state.

The love of his life, Minnie Tucker, enabled Stinky to become "Papa" to her granddaughter, Sierra and all the children she watched everyday. He cherished all of his children and grandchildren.

Stinky believed in the good of all people and took the shirt off his back for anyone. The little old ladies always asked for Stinky to be their pilot – and he was proud to oblige. He always had a hardy wave and mischievous smile for everyone he encountered.

Stinky was preceded in death by his parents and Minnie Tucker. He is survived by his son Russell E. Hardy of North Pole, daughters Josephine Bahnke of Nome, Lindsay Hardy of Kotzebue and Clarice "Bunn" Hardy of Nome and sisters Tweet Brasic of Valdez and Mamie Reich of Kotze-

Georgiana Genieve "Penny" Wheeler Ione

Georgiana "Penny" Ione was born June 19, 1941 to the late Jack Wheeler of Kotzebue and the late Catherine Miller Wheeler of Teller. Penny died from medical complications in Anchorage, April 28, at the age of 69.

Penny, as she was known to both family and friends, was born in Nome. She was a shareholder in Golovin Native, Sitnasuak Native and Bering Straits Native corpora-

Penny was married to the late Edwin Punguk of Golovin, with whom she bore two sons, Charles and Timothy. Following Edwin's death, Penny married Guy Ione, Sr. of White Mountain.

As medical and age-related problems affected her, Penny moved to Anchorage, where she resided at the time of her death.

Penny was a caring and compassionate mother, whose love of her sons sustained her despite separation from them.

Penny was truly a believer in the Lord. She was a faithful follower and spent countless hours reading the Bible and citing biblical verses to later review.

Penny's hobby of working with yarns in her free time provided her friends and family with beautifully kitted or crocheted items handmade by her.

Her son, Charles, married Phyllis (Longley) of Nome. Typical of her, Penny opened her heart and life, embracing Phyllis' family of seven children as her own. Her love for them was unwavering to the very end.

In her younger years, Penny enjoyed the lifestyle of her people, living off the land and engaging in harvesting the resources.

Penny is survived by her sons Timothy Punguk, and Charles and Phyllis Punguk; and Alexie, Christopher, Irvin, Kelly, Krystal and daughter, Kailey, and Jon and Mikey, all of Nome.

Penny's family thanks Bering Straits Native and Golovin Native corporations, as well as many individuals in the community for the outpouring of support, comfort, caring and love we have received during this difficult time. May the lord and father, Jesus Christ, bless you all for what you have done.

Georgiana "Penny" Ione

ing was difficult. "The uncertainty was unbearable," she said.

Turnout at the election was brisk for Nome with a preliminary figure of 40 percent with 970 ballots cast. "They were out the door and [poll workers] were swamped from 5 o'clock to 7 o'clock [p.m.]," said City Clerk Sandy Babcock.

Of the 27 ballots that were to be counted on Wednesday morning, 22 were questioned, meaning the voters were not on the rolls when they showed up at the precinct; three were special-needs ballots that require hand-counting; and two were from voters on the rolls, but the ballots for some reason or another would not feed into the automated vote counter. Often those casting questioned ballots turn out to be registered in another district, such as Anchorage or a nearby village, and are thus unable to vote. Only those residing within Nome's city limits were able to cast ballots Tuesday.

Those two ballots that the machine wouldn't take would likely be enough to keep Timbers on the board by producing a tie vote. Election officials at the polls Tuesday evening were not completely certain how ties would be handled. Alaska law states that, "If a majority vote favors recall, the office becomes vacant upon certification of the recall election." While the law does not address a tie directly, a draw is not a majority vote.

If Tuesday night's unofficial numbers hold, Karmun and Nickels as the remaining members would have 30 days to fill the vacancies, according to Alaska law. If all member would have been recalled, the governor would have appointed three people to the board who would have then selected the remaining two. Those recalled may not be appointed back to the board. Those not recalled cannot be the subject of another recall petition for at least six months.

When asked if the board, however it is comprised, can move beyond this issue, Karmun answered matter-of-factly. "It will still be a functioning board," she said. "When the final outcome is tallied tomorrow, that will be deciding factor."

The results of the election come after months of angry and emotional testimony at school board meetings and work sessions, dueling signs around town and opposing Facebook pages on the Internet, and plenty of hurt feelings and accusations from those on both sides of the issue. The vote was spurred by a Jan. 12 closed-door session, after which the board voted 3-2 to not renew the contracts for the principal and assistant principal at Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School.

Ever since that meeting, a stead line of parents, teachers and community members have approached the board to voice dissatisfaction over the decision and ask why it was made. Some have been more diplomatic than others. Those supporting the school board have been largely silent in the months leading up to Tuesday's vote, with a handful of people stepping up to the microphone at board meetings to say so.

In the days leading up to the election, however, the battle to persuade Nome residents to vote one way or the other reached a fevered pitch on both sides. Large plywood signs have been propped up all over Nome, many of them red, white and blue and only looking substantially different in whether or not they say "vote yes" or "vote no." One sign sitting on the tundra near Icy View imploring voters to recall the board by checking "Yes" had a large black "No" spray-painted over it.

Signs also briefly appeared on telephone poles around town stating "Vote Native Vote No," but were taken down after a short stint. Many of the signs backing the board that remained instead touted the board members as "Nomegrown" and "Your School Board." Both sides claimed a vote for their point of view was a vote for Nome's students.

The argument has also spilled onto the Internet in the form of mass e-mails and pages of dueling comments linked to the Anchorage Daily News website's reporting on the issue. While for the mostly a series of traded barbs, the comments cover an array of perceptions regarding the vote's significance. Some laid it out as an effort to deliver justice to the two released administrators, while others said the majority of the school board was standing up for parents who had complained of how their children were treated at Nome-Beltz. Others posting comments drew it out along racial lines. Still, others framed the issue in terms of personal politics, saying a dispute over the high school basketball team was a factor.

The truth of the motivation behind the board's vote remains unknown as the Jan. 12 discussion was held in a closed executive session. The board has refused to release what was discussed in that private meeting. Doug Boyer, the assistant principal whose contract was not renewed, requested information on why he was not brought back in February. He finally received a response last week citing budgetary considerations. The district, however, has included the position in its budget for next year and has been advertising for the job for months.

The specific grounds for recall for all five board members argue, among other reasons, that the board members violated the Alaska Open Meetings Act, acted against its own board policies and improperly discussed principal Janeen Sullivan without notifying her.

visions of the contract for an extra year.

Implementing the salary increases will result in a cost differential of $55,903 next year, $103,740 in 2011-2012 and $271,127 in 2012-2013 when compared to the district's early figures based on giving 1.2 percent raises each of the three years.

The district found itself in a better position to offer more generous salaries after finding out that health care costs would be significantly lower next year than was initially predicted. The district predicted a 15 percent increase in premiums for next year when the number actually came in at 6.8 percent, according to the district's business director Jenny Martens. She noted that the difference in the actual versus the predicted rate resulted in a savings of $60,000 in the budget.

Martens also noted that costs attributed to the district's health reimbursement account played a large role in opening up more room in the budget.

After evaluating the actual claims submitted to the count, the district's contribution was lowered by $100,000. Martens said the budget reduction would most likely be a one-time affair. "The new contribution rate is based on claims experience and cannot be reduced lower then that experience," she wrote in an e-mail to the Nugget.

Vote tally unkown

Recall appears to fail for 4 of 5 school board members, count still unofficial

By Tyler Rhodes

By the time Tuesday rolled around-a full week after Nome voters had gone to the ballot box to determine the fate of its school board-Heather Payenna had spent a week uncertain of whether or not she would keep her seat.

"I'm just ready, one way or the other, to have this election be certified and be in the books," Payenna said outside city hall just after noon on June 1. As of Tuesday afternoon, it looked like she would still have to wait.

Payenna was on her way to an expected Nome Common Council meeting to canvass and certify the results from the May 25 vote. That she was a few minutes late didn't matter; the council was unable to meet and recall election still unsettled for at enough that it appeared safe to call least another couple of days.

After several tabulations and recounts, the most recent conducted by hand on May 28, the shifting results appeared as of press time to have only succeeded in removing one person, Albert McComas, from the five-member board. With razorthin margins between their "yes" and "no" votes, Payenna and fellow board member Kirsten Timbers have oscillated between being recalled and retained as the succeeding unofficial tallies have come in.

The most recent numbers—observed by witnesses to the May 28 hand recount-would keep both women on the board with Timbers enjoying a two-vote margin (484 to retain vs. 482 to recall) and Payenna up by a single vote (478-477).

While also close, the margins between the votes concerning McCo-

Bering Straits, Sitnasuak to talk Front Street with DOT

By Laurie McNicholas

The top officers of Bering Straits Native and Sitnasuak Native corporations will present their objections to the proposed Steadman Street site for a new state office building to Commissioner Leo von Scheben of the Department of Transportation and Public Facilities, other state officials and the Nome Common Council at a work session June 9 from 1:30 p.m. to 3:30 p.m. in the council chambers at City Hall.

All council work sessions are open to the public, but no public testimony is taken during work sessions, notes Mayor Denise Michels.

A recent letter to von Scheben from BSNC leaders outlined the corporation's investments in Nome's economy, said that a segregated building for all of Nome's state offices would do nothing to generate a local economy, criticized the site DOTPF selected for the building at the north end of Steadman Street, and called for well-publicized local hearings about the effects of the plan on Nome and the surrounding

Temporary fix slated for corroded port fuel valves

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Port Commission discussed measures to address the corrosion of expansion joints on all three fuel pipelines suspended under the causeway bridge with Harbormaster Joy Baker at a meeting on May 27. The lines are used to transfer fuel from barges to the city's bulk fuel storage tanks adjacent to the Nome harbor.

Significant corrosion of expansion joints on the lines, including the body and chromed sliding surface of the joint, were detected by a fueling company in May 2009, according to report from SEAKERS Inc.

"A follow up inspection was performed in March of 2010 by Brent Goering Mechanical Engineering,' wrote Todd Fisher of SEAKERS in a letter to Baker dated May 8. "[The] inspection indicates all six Hyspan expansion valves are corroded to some degree and the chromed sliding joint surface is significantly deteriorated in the three northern valves and it is likely that one of the three joints is currently inoperable and will ultimately result in a fuel leak.'

Baker reports the city has asked the Army Corps of Engineers to have the joints replaced, but it will take six months to obtain the hardware and the replacement work is best done in the winter. She asked the commission to endorse a stopgap measure proposed by SEAKERS to ensure use of the pipelines this summer.

The commission approved $19,199 for SEAKERS to perform the following work. SEAKERS will remove and discard existing wet can-their feet.

Dear Editor,

I have been the recent victim of identity theft in unusual way. Someone has written some fairly insulting opinions on the Anchorage Daily News Rural Alaska Blog site addressing the recent recall vote of the Nome School Board. I did not become aware of the blog and its content until things were well along. I have a long career of dealing with speculation on my actions as a biologist and emergency services. When I have taken a position on a subject, I usually make a statement and try not to banter back and forth. I can respect those who disagree with me, and in my experience, calling the other side names generally means of our city. It's Nome's pulse. It's where business offices are located, where we get our mail. It's where we go to court, where we buy our gifts, go out for dinner, grab a cup of coffee or a cold drink. It's where we lodge our guests and hold meetings. In spite of the voluje of commerce that takes place, we have let our town center get a bit shabby. We have too many vacant lots and empty, ugly buildings. We need to get busy and power up the bulldozers and fill some flowerpots. We could also add a couple park benches for some weary walkers to rest

The spruce-up job would not be outrageously expensive or labor intensive— well, maybe getting rid of that Wein Building eyesore would take some doing. The empty lots could be made into parking lots and pocket parks. However, the real danger we face is from the absolute abandonment of our historic downtown. The State of Alaska without an if-you-please has threatened to suck the life out of Front Street and move it to a big box on Sixth Avenue. While Nomeites scratch their heads and say, "What the ...?" the state goes full bore ahead thinking it knows what's best for us. Woah! If we are to have new state offices let's assess the available lots on Front Street. Let's also look at the office space that is available. Let's look at the new building's architectural design. Let's make sure it fits our historic image and let's let our local contractors build it. For the record I have attended Nome Public Schools. My children have attended Nome Public Schools, My wife has taught at Nome Public Schools, and we all have degrees from universities. I work with and employ people from Nome Public Schools. There is room for improvement in all schools and with their administration, but that does not translate to any disrespect to Nome school graduates.

The person who wrote these communications apparently was beyond their comfort level on the topics. They were certainly beyond mine. I have to wonder if the over the top statements were meant to defame me. Why else would they sign my name rather than their own? All I can ask is that readers take those communications as the view point of a person unwilling to take ownership and of a person who at some level knew they were doing something dishonest.

On the issue of the School Board I was torn. There are points on either side of the issue that I can agree with. I went to the ballot box still thinking. I hope that true discussion of the issues can prevail.

Sincerely, Charlie Lean

Dear Editor.

I'm making a big stink about the stink in Stebbins as a resident of Stebbins. I know firsthand about what the stink can cause. So may many others that live in Stebbins, have open trash containers as well as uncovered, overfilled honeybucket containers that rarely are sanitized after an overfill.

As overfilled containers are taken to get emptied, these containers spill out when running over bumps on the same public road travelers use when going into and out of Stebbins, creating a health hazard, especially upon returning to town.

Health hazards may include but are not limited to long-term respiratory illnesses, open wound infections, cardiovascular problems and many other problems.

To make an in-depth, detailed, long story short, action has be taken! Why are our mayor, administrator, city council members waiting for something bad to happen to someone before doing something about it? These elected officials that we've chosen to govern our town are the same ones who are supposed to help our community, not just financially but environmentally as well.

Although this letter may create bad publicity towards the city of Stebbins, I'm also trying to prevent further damage our community is doing to the health and safety of our next generation. Thank you! George I. Dan, Jr.

Dear Nancy,

Like the song, "Here I Go Again," I have this need to voice my opinion and concern

By the time this letter gets printed the massive, illegal, Health Care Reform bill will have passed.

When I say "illegal," I mean our politicians in Washington, D.C. have given out a "Right" which is actually a "Privilege." Health Care us a commodity, which all Americans have access to.

Having a choice of which car to buy or food, clothing, etc. to purchase, again these are commodities. Choosing to buy Health Care coverage is also a choice. Having the government mandating that I purchase an insurance policy to cover my medial expenses is not a choice. I've left Senator Mark Begich a phone message (he never answers it himself) that I'd rather eat a bullet then be forced to buy something I don't want. I pay my own way or I go without.

You all remember Senator Begich, the Democrat who has voted along party lines since being sworn in. To me, he has abandoned Alaskans. He has sold us out so he can reap the rewards of being "a good party mem-

Senator Begich will tell you he has voted along party lines to better all Alaskans and the American people. Avalanche in the Ruth Gorge kills two climbers

In the Denali National Park and Preserve, an avalanche killed two climbers on Saturday afternoon. Canadian Andrew Herzenberg, 39, and Israeli Avner Magen, 42, were descending a steep snow and ice gully on the southeast side of the Gorge when the avalanche occurred. Another climbing party in the Ruth Gorge witnessed the avalanche and spotted what appeared to be two climbers and gear in the avalanche debris. They called for help and a helicopter flew to the site, where rangers confirmed that the two men had died in the fall. Both bodies were recovered on Sunday morning. Earlier this week, rangers were busy rescuing four climbers. One Canadian miraculously survived a 1,000-foot fall on a technically difficult route up to Mt. McKinley with only a shoulder injury. The other three had altitude-related illnesses and required escorts down the mountain.

Grizzly bear shot by backpackers in Denali National Park

In the first shooting since a new federal law allows handguns in National Parks, a man shot a grizzly bear last week when hiking in Denali National Park. The man was in the company of a woman and they chose to hike in dense brush along the edge of a creek, only one and a half mile away from the Parks road. The man drew a .45 caliber semiautomatic pistol when they heard a noise coming from the brush. When the bear emerged from the thicket and ran toward the other hiker, he fired nine rounds in its general direction. The backpackers ran back to the road, where they encountered a National Park Service employee. Rangers closed the area until they sent out wildlife technicians to the scene. They found the dead bear, and its body was transported via helicopter to the park's headquarters for investigation. Park wildlife biologists and rangers are trying to determine if there was a justification for shooting the animal. It is now legal to carry a firearm in the former Mt. McKinley National Park portion of the park, but it is not legal to discharge it. The case is still under investigation, and the names of the backpackers are not being released. This is the first known instance of a grizzly bear being shot by a visitor in the wilderness portion of the park. The estimated grizzly bear population in the park north of the Alaska Range north is 300 to 350 animals.

Governor signs more bills

Last week, Governor Sean Parnell signed legislation that extends the Alaska Permanent Fund Dividend's charitable program called Pick.Click. Give. The bill also amends the law to allow heirs to apply for dividend checks of people who died that year. SB 171 repeals the sunset clause in the 'Pick. Click. Give.' program, which was set to end on December 31, 2011. The bill also relaxes eligibility requirements to allow more organizations to qualify and makes changes to streamline the process. In Nome, the Bering Sea Women's Group, the Nome Preschool Association and Kawerak Inc. were listed as eligible non-profits to receive donations through Pick.Click.Give.

Parnell also signed House Bill 186, the Firearms Freedom Act. The bill establishes that a personal firearm, firearm accessory or ammunition that is made either commercially or privately in Alaska and that remains in the state is not subject to federal law or regulation. Parnell says the law frees the State of Alaska from restrictive federal firearm regulation and allows the state to take responsible firearm regulation into their own hands.

Parnell signed House Bill 319. which changes statutes on Alaska concealed handgun permits. The bill says that a permit does not have to be surrendered when it expires or when a permit holder moves out of the state. The bill also clarifies that an expired permit can be displayed, as long as the permit holder is not claiming that it is a valid permit. It also requires the Department of Public Safety to mail a notice to the permit holder at least 90 days prior to the expiration of a permit.

State clashes with feds over Unimak predator control

The State of Alaska last week filed a lawsuit against the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service for blocking a proposed predator control action on Unimak Island intended to preserve a caribou herd. The lawsuit claims that the US Fish and Wildlife Service has violated the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, the National Wildlife Refuge System Administration Act, the Administrative Procedure Act and a Memorandum of Understanding with the State of Alaska. The state ok'd the killing of seven wolves as the wolf population is blamed for decimating the caribou herd. The USFWS said more studies are needed. The USFWS threatened immediate criminal prosecution of any state employees who would trespass within the Alaska Maritime National Wildlife Refuge, which covers almost all of Unimak Island. U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski threw her weight behind the state and said she strongly supports the State of Alaska's legal action.

Wildfires start early in Alaska

An early fire season started in the Interior of Alaska due to early snowmelt. a lack of precipitation and warm temperatures. So far, 220 fires, 87 still active, have scorched more than 260,000 acres of land. A fire near Tok caused the evacuation of the small communities of Tanacross and Eagle Subdivision. The so-called Eagle Trail fire is within a half mile of Tanacross and burned almost 8,600 acres. It is not contained and 529 personnel are fighting the blaze. The Gilles Creek Fire 18 miles up the Pogo Road has burned 15,000 acres, with 175 personnel dispatched to fight it. Out of precaution, electricity to the Pogo mine has been shut down and the Pogo Mine road is closed. The Toklat fire, roughly 25 miles southwest of Nenana, burned 100,136 acres, with 174 fire fighters dispatched. The Applegate fire northeast of Manley Hot Springs burned12,000 acres and has crossed the Elliot Highway in multiple sections.

NJUS has full plate with summer work slate

By Sandra L. Medearis

It will be difficult to ride around town this summer without seeing utility employees in safety vests as they work a sewer and water construction timeline from right now until November.

At its May 25 meeting, the Nome Joint Utility System board of directors reviewed a schedule of half a dozen projects and passed resolutions approving funding. The projects, assigned to two crews, extend the services and at the same time, benefit already existing rate-payers.

For Sewer and Water Construction Crew No. 1, the work orders include:

• Plumbing and electrical upgrades to the National Guard Hangar near Center Creek Road, with work already underway and a completion goal of mid-June. The project will comprise final electrical connections within the Guard building.

• A new sewer main for Bypass Road (Seventh Avenue) running from East K to East N streets to serve the new hospital, work slated to finish by October. At the first part of summer, workers will construct utility trench upgrades and later on put in a pressure reducing station.

• Additional work on replacing the transmission line carrying water from Moonlight Springs into homes and businesses in town, with Phase Two starting in mid-September and going on for six weeks.

• Upgrades to the Gold Avenue water main and work at the River Street Lift Station, during October, finishing with planting grass in the area.

While all this is going on, Sewer and Water Construction Crew No. 2 will work on Sixth Avenue Pump House upgrades, scheduled to finish at the beginning of November. This work will enable NJUS to serve the hospital with a higher water pressure gradient and at the same time, improve water pressure to Icy View, especially for firefighting, according to NJUS manager John K. Handeland.

In other upgrade work, NJUS will install a SCADA system to monitor its connection to Banner Wind Farm. And what is a SCADA system? SCADA is an acronym that stands for Supervisory Control and Data Acquisition. SCADA refers to a system that collects data from various sensors at a remote location and then sends this data to a central computer which then manages and controls the data. This is good, Handeland said Monday.

"Right now, our knowledge of what is happening comes from looking out the window," he said.

In other business, the board passed on a resolution to state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities advising them that after the new Snake River Bridge went in, the state would need to continue maintenance on the existing Snake River Bridge.

Why? Because utilities crossing the existing bridge will not be relocated to the new bridge. The existing bridge will remain in service to carry the following functions across the river:

- Water feed from Moonlight Springs to the community.
- Water feed connecting to Seppala Drive to distribute potable water and fire protection to the community.
- Water supply and return lines to distribute drinking water and fire protection to the Nome Airport.
- Sewer force main from the airport.
- Power feeder to Nome Airport, FAA Housing and other facilities, the National Guard Hangar, and the Anvil Mountain Correctional Center. The bridge also allows NJUS to route power in emergency situations to keep the lights on at the high school, DOT offices and maintenance complexes, Icy View, the existing hospital, and existing emergency services facilities—fire, police and ambulance.
 - Lines of other utility services.

CITGO picks up the fuel tab

Free heating fuel program back again

Kawerak Inc. has announced that the region's residents, including those living in Nome, are again eligible for credit toward their heating fuel bills through the petroleum company CITGO.

This year's credit will be $450 for all households in the region. According to a press release from Kawerak, there are no income standards or tribal affiliation requirements. The $450 is a one-time gift per household.

For residents of Nome, a voucher drive will be held in the lobby of the Sitnasuak Building located on Front Street. To qualify, recipients must reside in the Nome area. The drive will be held from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. June 7-11. The building is the large yellow structure with the polar bear statue.

Residents in the region's villages can begin picking up fuel from their vendors starting June 7.

The program has provided free heating fuel to residents of the region for several years now. CITGO. although incorporated in the United States, is owned by the government of Venezuela. Last year the free heating fuel program appeared to be in jeopardy as the charitable arm of the company announced in January 2009 that the giveaway was to be scuttled. The announcement made in the dead of winter sparked uproar and the company did a quick turnaround to bring the program back online. Last summer the region was able to cash in the $450 vouchers with fuel distributors.

Questions regarding the program can be directed to Kawerak's Carolyn Kulukhon between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. at (907) 443-4466 or by e-mailing ga.citgo@kawerak.org.

Range marker lights

Baker showed the commissioners photos of two range marker lights the U.S. Coast Guard plans to install for safe navigation of the entrance to the Nome harbor. The front ranger light is to be located in lot 64A, block 57 off Seppala Drive, and the rear range light is to be placed on land adjacent to West I Street between the Nome Cemetery and blocks 102 and 134.

Baker said each range marker is 6 feet wide and 15 feet high with an elevation of more than 20 feet because it will stand on a mound. The state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities (DOTPF) has informed her that the range markers will not violate airspace and the Federal Aviation Administration has said no application will be needed for the range markers, she added.

Commissioner Charlie Lean asked if the range markers' lights will be have directional shrouds to prevent flares that could cause problems for aircraft in flight. Baker said the lights will flash every six seconds and will be directed at the harbor entrance, not toward the airport. Lean noted that landing lights at the airport have directional shrouds. The Nome Common Council plans to take final action on a proposed ordinance to lease municipal land to the Coast Guard for the range markers at a regular meeting on June 14.

FY 2011 draft budget

Baker presented a draft budget for FY 2011 to the commission. Chairman Jim West Jr. asked why the cost for professional services to prepare a port and harbor development plan is budgeted at $40,000 instead of the $30,000 figure approved by the commission. Baker said when the scope of work for a 10-year plan was discussed, $30,000 did not seem sufficient. West said to budget $30,000 for the project, and if bids exceed that amount, the budget can be amended. Baker provided the commissioners with a draft of the request for proposals to develop the plan.

Baker relayed a report to the commission from City Manager Josie Bahnke that the status of funding the city requested from the Legislature for the port is not yet known. The city asked for $600,000 to install high mast lighting at the causeway and inner harbor, $50,000 for public restroom facilities at the port, and $500,000 to install utility hookups for vessels at four docks in the inner harbor and causeway.

The commission decided to schedule a work session on the budget June 11 at 6 p.m., followed by a regular meeting at 7 p.m. West said he would like to obtain more information about potential revenue sources for the port next year, and asked Baker to invite City Controller Cussy Kauer to participate in the June 11 work session.

Baker said the city's new search and rescue/oil spill response boat is on a barge bound for Nome. A grant of $102,000 from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and port funds will pay for the 28x10foot Packman port workboat, which cost $185,000.

Airport plan alternatives

Lean described the content of a letter he drafted to DOTPF after he heard the agency still is considering moving the Snake River as an alternative in the Nome airport runway safety area expansion project. If water from the river does not continue to flow through the small harbor and the large harbor, a delay in ice leaving the harbors and a loss of commerce will result, Lean said.

"I am concerned about sanitation," he added. "Water moving through the harbor prevents stagnation. The loss of a freshwater/saltwater mixing zone would have bad effects on salmon and other fish. The airport would be improved by moving it northwest because of traffic patterns. Move the airport instead of the river.'

'Is anyone in the city in favor of moving the river?" Commissioner Jeff Darling asked. "I feel as Charlie does. As a commission will we take a stand on behalf of the city?

'We can," Baker replied. She said Mayor Denise Michels has expressed opposition to moving the river in a letter to DOTPF. Lean suggested that the Port Commission send a letter similar to his draft to the mayor or the Nome Common Council. Baker said she has information to add to the letter and she asked Lean for time to provide input after reading it carefully. A final version of the letter was not available at press time.

All members of the Port Commission attended the meeting except for Campbell Kristenson.

Attempted bootlegging proves costly

Botched booze run costs Elim man a boat, motor, four-wheeler and two years

An Elim man was sentenced to two years in jail and will lose a boat, motor and four-wheeler in the resolution of a botched bootlegging scheme attempted last August.

Timothy L. Moore, 40, was handed the two-year sentence and order to forfeit his property from Judge Ben Esch May 25 in Nome. Moore was convicted by a jury in February for one count of felony alcohol importation. The 18-foot Lund skiff, its motor and a Honda four-wheeler were all used in the effort to deliver more than 80 bottles of hard liquor and several cases of beer from Nome to Elim, a community which forbids the use and possession of alcohol.

Testimony in Moore's trial revealed how Moore and his nephew, Martin Saccheus, boated from Elim with the four-wheeler on board to the Solomon River, east of Nome last August. The two continued to Nome on the four-wheeler where they met up with Wayne Moses, who aided them in purchasing the alcohol and getting it back to the boat.

While Moses took the fourwheeler back to Nome, Moore and Saccheus made their way toward Flim in the boat. Their return home, however, was stalled when the boat's motor lost its prop, stranding the two at sea. With the aide of the U.S. Coast Guard and a good Samaritan vessel, the two and their boat were brought to Golovin where Alaska State Trooper Jay Sears was waiting. While most of the alcohol that was onboard had been jettisoned into the sea, a small amount remained on the boat when Sears investigated. More evidence began to wash up on the beaches near Golovin in the days that followed.

Moses and Saccheus agreed to work with state prosecutors in exchange for dropped or reduced charges for their roles in the scheme. Saccheus pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor charge last November of importing alcohol. Moses had a charge of felony transport of alcohol to a dry community dropped for his cooperation.

Recall recount

their races. McComas looks to have been recalled by a vote of 493 to 469. Karmun should keep her seat with a vote of 496 to retain her and 446 to recall. The fifth board member, Barb Nickels, enjoyed the widest margin, receiving an unofficial tally of 580 to retain and 362 to recall. The vote tallies for the three members reflect the unofficial results from a machine recount conducted May 26.

All vote tallies remain unofficial until the Nome Common Council meets to canvass and certify the results. That was initially to take place May 27, however, the requests for hand recounts of the ballots for Payenna and Timbers spurred the council to delay its action until June 1. That June 1 meeting never materialized.

With most of the school board members sitting in the chambers at noon June 1, only Nome Mayor Denise Michels and Councilman Jerald Brown were sitting at the table. As the noon whistle blew, Michels told the crowd that their attendance was in vain. The council meeting had not been publically announced, and even if it had been, the council had no report from the election judges to review. "The council is not here because we can't make a decision because we weren't properly advertised," Michels said.

Michels said the council would tentatively try and meet on Friday at noon.

The most recent unofficial tallies as of press time for Timbers and Payenna come from a May 28 hand recount that came after two Nome citizens made the request for each candidate. Up until that recount, the results showed Payenna narrowly losing her seat. When the polls closed May 25 Payenna faced an unofficial tally of 479 to recall and 467 to retain. After questioned and other ballots that could not be read by the machine were tallied the next day, Payenna's unofficial total stood at 479 to 471, still appearing to have resulted in recall. After a machine recount conducted later in the day May 26, the margin narrowed but still would have had the same result with a tally of 481-475. It wasn't until the hand recount, requested by Louis Green Jr., that Payenna's fate appeared to change with the 478 votes to retain her versus the 477 to recall her.

The progression for Timbers also saw a changing bottom line with each successive count. At the polls closure, the unofficial numbers had Timbers losing her seat by two votes (475 to recall vs. 473 to retain). After the questioned and other remaining ballots were counted the next day, she looked to keep her seat by two votes (478 to retain vs. 476 to recall). The May 26 machine recount put her at an even 478 to 478 votes, meaning she would remain on the board since it requires a majority to unseat a sitting board member. The May 28 hand recount, requested by Joe Kennedy, appeared to give her a bit more breathing room with a total of 484 voting to retain and 482 voting to recall.

Kennedy's request for the hand recount of the ballots concerning Timbers came as the common council started their May 27 meeting to canvas the votes. Later in the meeting, Councilman Brown suggested a second hand recount be conducted. "There was another seat there that was very close," Brown said. "I think to avoid the appearance of something evil...we should also recount the ballot for Heather Payenna."

While it was Brown who put the idea on the table, it was Green who put it in writing to request the hand recount for Payenna. Green was sitting in the audience observing the meeting and reluctantly stepped forward to make the request.

The requests set off a discussion of how ballots with questionable markings would be counted. Councilman Stan Andersen wanted to be certain that a policy was in place to establish a final arbitrator on questionable ballots before the count started. "I want something in writing that says who makes the final decision," Andersen said. "I don't want us as a collective board making that decision. I want something in writing from somebody else.'

Andersen got his wish. City attorney Brooks Chandler advised the region. A copy of the letter appeared in the May 20 edition of The Nugget.

Teri Veasey of DOTPF said the department is not prepared to hold public hearings on the issue at this time, but von Scheben wants to listen to comments from BSNC and Sitnasuak officials. Sitnasuak representatives have suggested downtown alternatives to the Steadman Street site for state offices at meetings of the Nome Planning Commission and the Common Council.

The NPC unanimously approved a preliminary plat for the new state office building on Steadman Street at a meeting May 4. The move indicates the proposed land use, as mapped, meets the City codes under which a project site is evaluated, with required fees paid to the city. The approval does not mean the commission takes a position on the location of the building. The Common Council adopted a resolution approving the Steadman Street site in March, but reversed that stand April 12, rejecting the site in favor of a Front Street location.

In addition to von Scheben, participants at the council's work session June 9 will include Frank Richards, deputy commissioner, and Matt Desalernos, engineer/architect, DOTPF; Mike Black, deputy commissioner, Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development; Chris Christensen, deputy administrative director, and Lesa Hall, facilities manager, Alaska Court System; Tim Towarak, president. Gail Schubert, chief executive officer, and Jerald Brown, vice president, BSNC; Trudy Sobocienski, president and CEO of Sitnasuak; Michels and council members. Brown is a member of the NPC and of the Common Council.

OCS drilling in the Chukchi or Beaufort Seas suspended

By Diana Haecker

In response to the ongoing oil spill disaster caused by the explosion of the BP drill platform Deepwater Horizon in the Gulf of Mexico, the U.S. Department of the Interior Secretary Ken Salazar last Sunday put in writing what President Barak Obama announced last week: no more offshore continental oil lease sales, no drilling in the Arctic and a moratorium on deepwater drilling.

Salazar canceled lease sales in the Gulf of Mexico and a proposed lease sale off the coast of Virginia. He also suspended proposed exploratory drilling in the Arctic. The suspension has no time limit attached, but it could last until next year. Salazar also placed a sixmonth moratorium on deepwater drilling - deeper than 500 feet - to implement new safety require-ments. Oil companies are allowed to continue retrieving oil from already completed wells, but are not allowed to do any kind of drilling to initiate or complete new wells. This is in response to criticism that the Dept. of Interior's previous moratorium continued to allow the very same kind of drilling that was occurring on BP's Deepwater Horizon when it exploded. The new moratorium does not allow such drilling types.

Shell had plans to drill two exploratory wells in the Chukchi Sea and in the Beaufort this summer. In response to the drilling ban, Governor Sean Parnell alleges that Salazar's decision to suspend drilling in the Arctic is based on fear, not sound science. He said Shell's exploration plans have been reviewed extensively and that he "simply cannot understand how the federal government could approve plans of exploration only five months ago approvals that were upheld by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals – but now refuse to take the final step in a long regulatory process and not authorize Shell's permits to drill." Par-nell played the economy card and said that Shell's oil and gas development and production "would have immediately created hundreds of jobs, generated revenue for federal, state and local governments, and helped extend the life of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System.'

Parnell also argued that development and production would have provided a domestic source of oil to help meet the nation's energy needs and ease the dependence on foreign sources.

Earlier this month, the Ninth Circuit court struck down a lawsuit to halt Shell's drilling plans. The Alaska Whaling Commission, the Inupiat Community of the Arctic Slope the village of Point Hope and nationwide environmental groups challenged the permit issued by the federal Mineral Management Service on grounds that the agency failed to conduct proper assessment of environmental impacts.

Alaska's congressional delegation stands together in their opinion that the suspension of Shell's OCS drilling is unjustified. Senator Mark Begich said in a statement that he is frustrated with the Obama Administration's decision to halt offshore development. He said this delay would cause higher costs for domestic oil and gas production to meet the nation's energy needs. And he defended Shell's plans saying, "The Gulf of Mexico tragedy has highlighted the need for much stronger oversight and accountability of oil companies working offshore, but Shell has updated its plans at the administration's request and made significant investments to address the concerns raised by the Gulf spill. They make an effective case that we can safely explore for oil and gas this summer in the Arctic." Congressman Don Young used harsher language and called the administration's decision "irrational" and "careless." "It is based only in response to the hysteria of interest groups that want to cripple our country," said Young. "We need to figure out what went wrong and fix the problem and not put our economy in further gridlock because of fear mongering from extremists. It's not smart and it's not right."

Senator Lisa Murkowski has not commented on the drill suspension but proposed legislation to streamline claims to make sure that victims of the BP oil spill get financial compensation fast. "This bill allows those affected by the spill to recover damages without having to rely on lawyers for a decades-long legal fight like Alaskans experienced with the Exxon Valdez,"

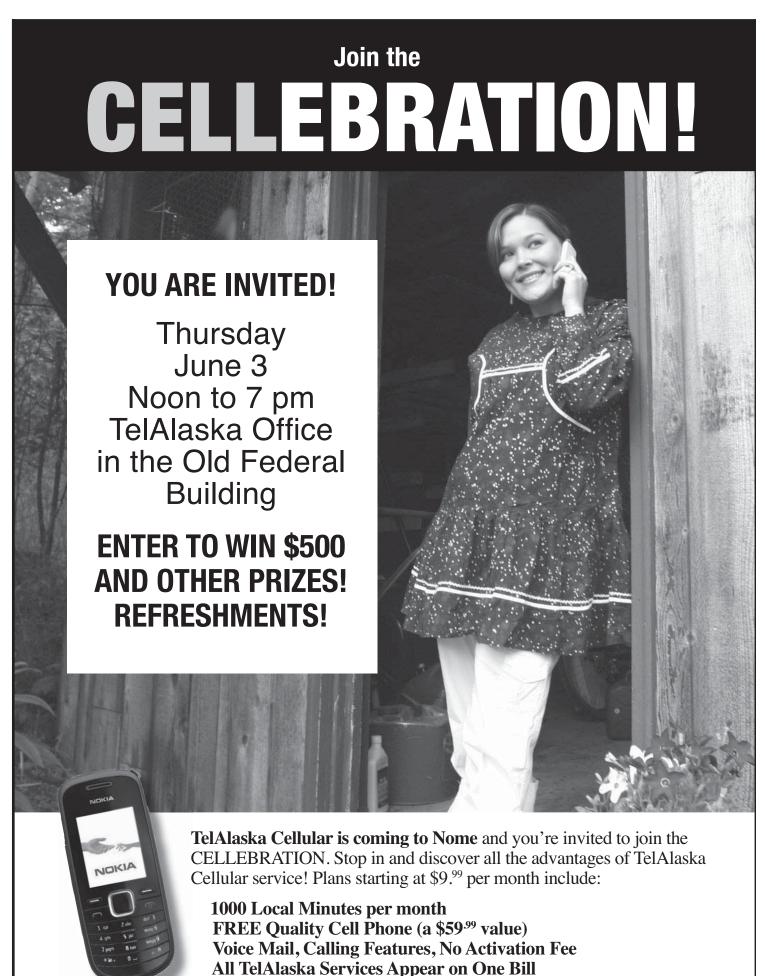

Murkowski said.

The Center of Biological Diversity, a national conservation organization that made headlines for their successful petitions on listing polar bears as an endangered species, has been pushing for restrictions on all offshore oil drilling. "We're glad to see the moratorium has been expanded to cover all deepwater drilling," said Kierán Suckling, executive director of the Center, "but we're very upset that restrictions on shallower water drilling have been lifted. All offshore oil drilling, whether deep or shallow, is dangerous and should be suspended."

Suckling said that the Interior Department continued to exempt all drilling plans from environmental review under a previously announced moratorium and that 17 new deepwater well drilling projects were allowed to proceed. He said, "It's not only illegal, but also deeply unethical for Salazar to allow these waivers to continue in the midst of the greatest environmental catastrophe in American history." As the government continues to probe into the cause of the spill and MMS's failed regulatory oversight, the inner workings of the MMS revealed a cozy relationship with the oil industry. Suckling suggested that Salazar remove former BP executive Sylvia Baca from her job as deputy assistant secretary for land and minerals management. This is in response to the inspector general's finding earlier this week that the revolving door between the oil industry and the MMS has undermined the agency's effectiveness and credibility.

The Center called for a permanent ban on all new offshore oil drilling, beginning in Alaska, arguing that instead of going after more oil, the nation should transition to clean energy sources such as sun and wind.

Student Broadcasting Team Interviews Governor

By Damon Hargraves, Student Broadcasting Facilitator, District Office

Governor Sean Parnell payed a surprise visit to Native Youth Olympic participants and fans this year at the State Games in Anchorage. After speaking to the crowd and handing out awards, Governor Parnell spent time talking to the BSSD Student Broadcasting Team. Janice Homekingkeo from Koyuk even spent time interviewing the Governor. Video for this interview can still be seen at http://sbt.bssd.org.

As has been the tradition for several years now, the Student Broadcasting Team has covered the State Native Youth Olympic games in Anchorage. The games proved to be exciting and entertaining as usual. Records were broken and tremendous sportsmanship was shown as we watched the athletes compete.

In addition to the Governor, Janice interviewed Anchorage Mayor Dan Sullivan. Another Student Broadcaster, Kevin Tocktoo from Brevig Mission, landed an interview with Olympic Snowboarder Callan Cythlook-Sifsof. Callan is from Alaska and participated in NYO growing up.

Farewell Address From the Superintendent

Another school year has concluded and graduations have been completed. With over 95 students graduating this year, we are quite proud of this year's senior class.

Over the past five years, the District has continued to raise our standards, and our students continue to meet the challenge.

More BSSD students are learning to high standards than ever before. With the release of the latest state assessment results, students are scoring at the highest levels in reading, writing and math. As I have continued to say, we are making progress but we still have work to do and a ways to go before we fulfill our mission of teaching ALL children.

This effort has required some students to return to school for a 13th year. We say that is great. We are more concerned with our students graduating than we are with the date on a calendar. As a result, more students who are returning to school are completing the needed requirements to earn a full BSSD high school diploma. Congratulations to those who persevere.

This work has been hard and I want to thank the District Office administration, principals, teachers and staff of our school district. You have taken on an enormous challenge and made progress I could not have imagined. I also wish to thank our school board for their support and demanding that we do better for the students of our region. Our Board recognized that if some students were failing we were not fulfilling our mission. Our mission is to teach all our students.

Two exceptional people have dedicated their professional lives to this district and have left a lasting mark because of their efforts. BSSD will greatly miss Kim and Greg Johnson next year.

Mrs. Kim Johnson, has served BSSD for the past fifteen (15) years and will be moving to Montana this July with her family. Mrs. Johnson has helped lead our district in raising student achievement in the area of reading. I am proud to say that as a district, our reading scores on the latest assessments are at the highest levels in the history of BSSD. She has also been instrumental in our Early Childhood Education (ECE) program and our Staff Development program. We will have ECE programs in all fifteen schools next year. I thank Mrs. Johnson for the many years of outstanding services to the students and staff in BSSD and for all of the support she has given me over the years.

Next, I would like to congratulate and thank Mr. Greg Johnson on his retirement. Mr. Johnson has worked for BSSD for the past twenty-six [26] years. He has been the Director of Curriculum and Instruction for the past ten years. Mr. Johnson has spent his entire professional career in BSSD and no one better represents the best of our district. He has lead BSSD in our instructional reform that has produced the highest achievement levels and the largest number of graduates. With the newly adopted five year strategic plan and the newly adopted curriculum and resources in Math and Science, he leaves BSSD with a path set for continued improvement. It has been an honor to work with him.

This will be my last Strait Talk article as Superintendent. It is with a heavy heart that I will be retiring after twenty-nine (29) years with BSSD. I have been fortunate enough to lead a talented and passionate group of educators the past three years. I am proud of the accomplishments of our students. This would not be possible without the commitment of the staff in BSSD and the support of the parents in our communities. The future is bright for our students.

I would like to thank the BSSD School Board for the opportunity to serve the students in our region. We have a dedicated Board that works as a team to serve all students. It has been an honor to work with you.

On a personal note, I would like to thank the community of Unalakleet for being a great place to live and raise a family and for making us part of the community. I am proud to have raised my sons from pre-school to high school graduation in Unalakleet.

Finally, I would like to thank the people of the region for their support over these many years. I have been fortunate enough to visit our communities many times and have had the opportunity to get to know many wonderful caring people in our region. I will miss all of you, but hope to visit again in the future

I wish everyone the best. Thank you.

Sincerely,

Jim Hickerson, Superintendent

Allen Kimoktoak holds his award, accompanied by Superintendent Jim Hickerson, Director of Facilities Bob Dickens, and Maintenance Supervisor Ric Ried.

Allen Kimoktoak Named Maintenance Person of the Year

Allen Kimoktoak, maintenance worker from Koyuk-Malemute School, was selected as 2009 BSSD Maintenance Person of the Year by a district maintenance panel. Allen has worked at Koyuk school since 1988 and was selected based on several qualities and strengths. First and foremost, the pride Allen takes in his work is obvious to all. He is willing to do the extra things to make sure the school reflects Koyuk in a positive manner. He is dedicated to ensuring the school functions properly and is a safe and comfortable place for student learning. Also, Allen is a dependable employee, completing monthly paperwork and working independently to solve maintenance problems. He is willing to ask questions of supervisors when necessary, and then tackle the tasks at hand. Finally, Allen has shown his willingness to work with others, both site custodians/staff and district itinerant workers, in a cooperative manner. For these and many more reasons, Koyuk-Malemute School and BSSD is proud to recognize the efforts of Allen Kimoktoak. Congratulations Allen Kimoktoak, Maintenance Worker, Koyuk Malemute School.

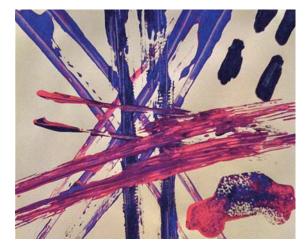

Here Come the Arts!

By Jim Nelson

After about a decade of slow decline, the arts are making a strong comeback in the schools of the Bering Strait School District. Emphasis on standardized test scores (brought about as part of a nation-wide response to the federal No Child Left Behind Act) has made it difficult for teachers in recent years to squeeze in some curricula at one time more prominently featured...like the arts.

However, as a result of both a national movement to return the arts to our schools (for the sake of art itself) combined with a growing understanding that many students learn better in all of the content areas when information is presented both linguistically (words and numbers) and nonlinguistically (pictures, graphs, music, photos, and video sequences); teachers are finding more and more ways to bring art back into their classrooms.

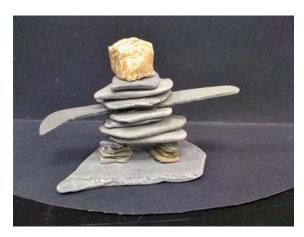

To support this, the Bering Strait School District has formed an Arts In Education committee which has sponsored several events including "miniresidencies" – where professional artists visit school sites and teach the students various art techniques—and "working weekends"—where teachers receive intensive training in art which they use in their instruction, or encourage students to use for assignments.

Art-be it visual, musical or performed—is one of the most ancient and enduring of all human traditions. All cultures have art and value it. Van Gough's paintings have been claimed to be among the most valuable objects on the planet. Money earned by many people, regardless of what they do to earn it, is often spent purchasing objects of art, or traveling to foreign lands to sightsee architecture, museums and culturally rich centers of music, film, or theatre.

Imagine a world in which all of people became highly educated in reading, writing and mathematics, but in which no art existed to express joy, frustration, contentment or passion. What would they do in their spare time? What would they value? How could they surround themselves with beauty?

Shaktoolik Says Aloha

3y Lynda Bekoalok, Teacher, Shaktoolik

3SSD encourages its students to think outside the box. Ten Shaktoolik students not only thought butside the box, they lived outside the box for ten days in Hawaii.

n March 2009, my elementary students (ages 3-12) asked if my husband and I would take them to Hawaii. I told them if they raised the money we would take them wherever they wanted to go. That very day after school the class had a meeting lead by class president McKenzie Sagoonick. They started brainstorming fundraising ideas and who they would write letters to asking for help. Three days later they had their first fundraiser and made $128. After writing literally hundreds of letters and 97 fundraising events later, on April 28th we anded in Honolulu, Hawaii!

The students: Donald Auliye, Crystal Katchatag, Anikan Paniptchuk, Everson Paniptchuk, Desiree Rock, Kacie Rock, McKenzie Sagoonick, Levi Sagoonick, Nathan Savetilik, and Ashley Sookiayak along with chaperones Amanda and Reuben Paniptchuk, Gary Bekoalok and myself spent ten wonderful days on the island of Oahu, Hawaii. As we came out of the clouds to see the Islands of Hawaii below us, the students started laughing and saying "YES! We made it!!" Donald said "For two weeks I have been dreaming of Hawaii and now my dreams have come true."

have been working on my master's degree online, one of my classmates, Tymmie, is from Hawaii. Tymmie Keala Ah-Chong and Kordell Keoka (the Chaplin at King Kamehameha Schools) arranged for us to stay at a wonderful house on the King Kamehameha School campus in Honolulu for the first five days. Tymmie is a teacher at the Hālau -Ōkahi Public Charter School. She and her family met us at the airport with the traditional lei greeting.

While in Honolulu the students met their pen pals from the Hālau Lōkahi Public Charter School. The pen pals exchanged gifts along with cultural songs and dances. Together we toured the Bishop Museum. Crystal commented that if was fun going to the planetarium with our pen pals and seeing the stars, sun and moon. We then all went to Jncle Gabe's. Uncle Gabe is a retired fireman who oves children. He has a beautiful oasis behind his house with ponds, trees, and flowers. The students made bamboo flutes and enjoyed hula dancing by they're new Hawaiian friends. We then went to the Mauna'ala The Hawaiian Royal Mausoleum where all of the Ali'i (Hawaiian Royalty) are buried. The students were amazed that while at the Mausoleum we were on not in the United States as it is on Sovereign Hawaiian land.

We enjoyed tours of the US Arizona Memorial, USS Missouri and the USS Bowfin. Everson said the Missouri was huge. "We went up real high on the ship and were way above the water. It was really scary being that high." Donald thought the Bowfin submarine was one of the coolest things he had ever seen.

Among the many activities the group experienced was lolani Palace. The students were greatly impacted by the fact that the Queen Lili'uokalani was arrested for treason falsely and held prisoner in her own palace for six months. She eventually died of a broken heart. Seeing her bare room with only a small desk and a tiny bed was sad, but the students saw the importance of standing firm and holding fast to your beliefs.

The group Eskimo danced and sang a song in Inupiaq at the King Kamehameha Chapel and at the Waolani Judd Nazarene School. They enjoyed meeting their new "cousins" and exchanging cultures. Kacie said she enjoyed eating donuts, drinking milk and playing on the play ground with their new friends at the Waolani Judd school.

We stayed at a penthouse condo at Pat's in Punalu'u for four days. Everyone enjoyed swimming at the the beach and pool. The highlight was spending a day at the Polynesian Cultural Center. We had a private tour of the seven islands of Polynesia, a canoe ride, luau and the best seats in the house at the show Ha'Da Breath of Life. Anikan's favorite part of the luau was the real pineapple that had a smoothie in it. "It was really good!" she said. The students jaw dropped when Kap Te'o Tafiti danced with fire knives. When he put the burning knives on his bare feet many of the students were beyond disbelief.

Another activity the students really enjoyed was riding horses at the Kualoa Ranch. They couldn't believe how big the horses were and how it wiggled when they walked. They also got to pet a pig, a donkey, a chicken. They saw a parrot, spider monkey and an ostrich. On the last day they students were treated to a surprise day at the Wet and Wild Water Park.

I was very proud of the students. Everywhere we went people complimented on how well behaved and respectful they were. Alaska, BSSD, Shaktoolik, their culture and their families should be very proud of them. They soaked in every ounce of the experience each day. They wanted to glean the most they could from every place we visited and every person they met. They saw how the Eskimo culture and the Hawaiian culture have many similarities and how they can learn from each other.

These ten students along with their families, worked extremely hard for over a year to make this happen. Many thought it was an impossible feat for ten children this age to make this happen. But as I told them from the beginning, if you believe in something strong enough and work hard enough, you can make it happen.

St. Michael School celebrates the newly hung metalwork art pieces and painted murals of moose, whales, geese, cranes, salmon, and other beasts. Commissioned metal artist Larry Mostello, and muralist James Adcox brought these animals to the school for students to enjoy.

What's the Hang Up?

White Mountain School has a new hang up. Community members and students cooperated to create the 89 piece fence project as part of their latest commissioned art. They designed, traced, cut, filed, drilled, primed, painted, sealed and then hung the artwork on the 90' fence outside the school. This project was made possible through the generous support of the Bering Strait School District, the Alaska State Council on the Arts and NSEDC. Next time you are in White Mountain, make sure to check out our newest creation.?

St. Michael Shop Students Build Snowmachines to Ride to Unalakleet

By Mark Thompson, Teacher, St. Michael

This year we finally reached a goal which was set quite a few years ago. That goal was to be able to use student efforts, to learn and use skills, to transport ourselves safely. The original plan involved building both sleds and machines - or parts thereofto make it happen. The "internal objective" was to provide students with as much of the "know-how" as possible so that they would have something they could use for the rest of their lives, skills which are quite practical for life in this part of the world.

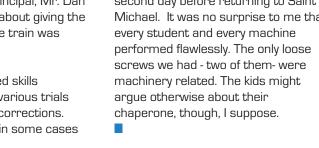

We didn't begin the year with the idea that this goal would be developed during the year. It actually evolved after some scheduling changes seemed to leave us with a pile of lemons. So we started by dabbling a bit with the basics of gasoline-powered machines. That grew into themes of greater depth and involvement. Finally, as student enthusiasm and motivation swelled, we began to talk about ultimate goals. Seeing the positive growth that students involved were demonstrating, our Principal, Mr. Dan Eide was enthusiastic about giving the kids his support. So the train was rolling.

Students demonstrated skills development through various trials and tests, errors and corrections. Mistakes were made, in some cases at significant monetary expense. But learning usually has some cost. And the big test was yet to be given.

Finally, with weather becoming an issue as winter began to give way to spring, it looked like we might not be able to make the final test of all the hard work. But we waited, impatient though we were, for the week of important academic tests to be completed. Then, with what we hoped was the best weather we might still have to safely travel, we began our trials. All but one machine had been tested and proven. One machine, a machine that had between 15-25,000 miles started the journey with a freshly rebuilt motor, a motor which had only 15 miles of break-in testing. Of the five machines we worked on, the odometer totals came to over 70,000 miles.

But the final test was an ace. We traveled safely, starting with seven students and myself and traveling with seven machines. We made the trip from Saint Michael to Unalakleet, a distance, one-way, of 70 miles. The students were able to make short presentations in Unalakleet the second day before returning to Saint Michael. It was no surprise to me that Students worked on most every machine. Here using a mallet. Brandon and Al work on a Polaris 488 engine.

We made some "gas money" for our trip by doing afterschool wood gathering; wood which we cut, split, and sold.

'This year we started a project to fix up enough snowmachines so that we will be able to take a class trip to Unalakleet. As the weeks went by, we repaired a lot of engines. One of the machines that we put together started off as just a frame that came from the Stebbins dump. After days of waiting for the necessary parts to arrive from eBay, we started to have something that resembled a real working snowmachine. Eventually, we had enough working machines to attempt a trip. Unfortunately for me, I broke my leg two weeks before the trip started. I got to watch my classmates start their trip without me. When they got back, I got to hear about a good trip.' Jarad Billingsley

This machine was the focus of the greatest effort and pride. This is the "eBay Express", a machine which was built mostly from parts which were purchased through eBay. It has parts from Minnesota, Wisconsin, South Dakota, Iowa, Montana, Colorado, Vermont, Michigan, as well as from a local dump.

"I remember when the 500 body came into the shop. It didn't look like much. Then we started working on it for a while and it started to look like a snowmachine. Parts came in pretty slow. Then part by part the 500 started coming to life. It was worth it to take all that time working on it to see it run in the end." - Al Otten Natalia and Celeste work on a hood.

This was how the "eBay Express" looked in January. This 500 chassis was the basis for the 340 powered machine we built. It gave no trouble and ran perfectly on our 140 mile trip.

> 'I remember when we were working on all the snowmachines we put together from eBay parts. We had some problems with a couple rigs, but we were able to find out what it was and fix it. After we got like five snowmachines fixed, we planned a trip to Unalakleet. The trip was fun, the presentation went well and we made it back with all the machines well and running good." - Petey Lockwood

"The fun thing about the shop class was when we had to rebuild two engines. One was a 550 SuperSport; the other we called the "eBay Express". We had to rebuild the SuperSport because we had an incident going to the steamboats. We were bringing an art lady there. Her name was Barbara Short. We started "eBay" with just a body from the Stebbins dump, nothing else was in it. We had to rebuild and fix up enough engines so we could have a school trip to Unalakleet." - John Ishnook

We stopped for a short break and to enjoy the view at Toik Hill. Two loose bolts were the sum of the problems we experienced with the machines.

Students Enroll and Tour UAF Campus

High school Seniors from BSSD went on an orientation tour of the University of Alaska Fairbanks. These seven seniors are officially admitted and plan on attending UAF next Fall semester. Two of the students are currently enrolled in dual-credit courses with Northwest Campus and two have been accepted to RAHI this summer. Such an ambitious and bright group of students!

At UAF the students went on a campus tour, attended various classes, met with a financial aid advisor, registered for classes for next fall semester, prepared their on campus housing arrangements and visited various departments on campus [School of Fisheries, Justice, Tanana Valley Campus, Large Animal Research Farm, University of Alaska Museum, Library Archives]. They were also welcomed to campus one night with a potluck hosted by Rural Student Services! It was definitely a busy and productive week for the students. The time in Fairbanks provided each student an opportunity to become more prepared for their "big step" next fall and helped them feel more confident about their futures at UAF!

Elim Student Helps Pass State House Bill

By Jon Crocker, Teacher, Elim

In early February of this year, an email went out to teachers across the state making a simple request: help us get the Alaskan Malamute named as the official state dog of Alaska. The request had come from the Polaris K-12 school, a school in Anchorage where a group of over 100 students have been trying to get the Alaskan Malamute named as state dog for over three years. In Elim, a sixth grader named Lincoln Saccheus answered that call by writing a letter of support for the malamute. He noted that the malamute would be an appropriate choice for state dog, as it has an extensive history in Alaska (between 4,000 and 20,000 years) and has also had a very close relationship with Alaska Natives.

He didn't know that his letter would make it all the way to the governor. The Polaris students had included Lincoln's letter in a packet that was given to the governor, as well as to each senator. Jamie Rodriguez, a 4th/ 5th grade teacher at Polaris, had this to say: "After a two year effort and the bill being stuck in the rules committee looking like it would die, Lincoln's letter charged their [the Polaris students'] batteries...He made their research come alive and they were newly charged to fight to make it happen to honor the first Alaskans." The bill was successfully passed by the Alaska Legislature. All it needed in order to become official was the governor's signature.

The signing took place at 10:30 am on May 12th at the Polaris School in Anchorage. Having helped in the passage of the bill, Lincoln was invited to attend- he did, and took his mother along as well. The two got to meet governor Sean Parnell. They also got to watch as a small part of Alaskan history took place. Alaska now has an official state dog: the Alaskan Malamute. And it might not have happened if Lincoln hadn't taken a few minutes out of his day to write a letter!

SBT Visits Alaska Dispatch

By Roberta Charles, Student Broadcaster, White Mountain

While we, the student broadcasting team, were in Anchorage to broadcast the state basketball tournament, we were able to go to Alaska Dispatch. They told us what they were and what they did. They also answered lots of questions that we had for them.

Alaska Dispatch started about two years ago. Alaska Dispatch is an online news source. It reports statewide news, events and issues of Alaska.

It's not only Alaska Dispatch journalists who can enter reports, but also people from all over Alaska can enter a writing piece about local news, or what is going on where they live. Alaska Dispatch likes to see local journalism submitted to them. So anyone can contribute to the Alaska Dispatch.

My Experience With Student Broadcasting

By Danny Pungowiyi, Student Broadcaster, Savoonga

I went to anchorage for Student Broadcasting Team (SBT). The things that I learned in Anchorage were how to be a camera man for people that couldn't fly to Anchorage and watch. We had to stream the games on the internet for people all over Alaska to watch. I learned how to control the mixer. The mixer is a machine that all the different cameras are run to. The mixer allows us to change the cameras from one view to another. We can change to the line that is coming from the camera that we want.

We also developed some questions for interviewing fans, winning team players, winning coaches, losing team players, losing team coaches, and the people that held the state tournament. Everybody got a chance to interview except for me because I was too nervous to be in front of the camera. We had to wake up earlier than we normally wake up for school because the games were starting at 8 or 9 am and it was hard. I don't like waking up too early. The things that were fun about Anchorage were learning how to use different forms of technology and equipment, meeting my friends from all over Alaska, and getting to watch the state basketball tournament.

Editor's Note: It has been my pleasure to edit StraitTalk and build upon the efforts of those before me these past three years. As editor, I have had a unique perspective of the district that I will miss next year. It's great to see all of the wonderful things happening, even the many things that don't get published. Thanks BSSD and the people of the Bering Strait.

The Alaska Village Electric Cooperative (AVEC) is proposing to install an electrical distribution intertie between the communities of Brevig Mission and Teller in western Alaska. The intertie would be funded in part by the US Department of Agriculture (USDA) Rural Utilities Service (RUS). AVEC, in compliance with the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA), is initiating a Categorical Exclusion (CE) to analyze the proposed intertie. It has been determined that the project, as proposed, would be located in wetlands and floodplains. The project would occupy less than one quarter of an acre of wetlands and floodplains.

AVEC has considered a variety of alternatives. including no action, and believes that there is no practicable alternative that would avoid locating the project in wetlands and floodplains.

Additional information on the project can be obtained from Brent Petrie at (907) 561.1818 or bpetrie@avec.org.

Comments on the environmental aspects of the proposed project should be submitted in writing to AVEC within 30 days of the publication of this notice. Copies of all comments received will be forwarded to the Rural Utilities Service for consideration prior to approval of financing assistance or taking other federal action related to the project.

NOTICE OF PROPOSED REVISION TO POWER COST EQUALIZATION BASE AMOUNT

The REGULATORY COMMISSION OF ALASKA (Commission) gives notice that pursuant to AS42.45.110(c)(2), it proposes to adjust the base amount for Power Cost Equalization (PCE) calculations (Docket U-10-030). AS42.45.110(c)(2) provides in part:

American Heart Association endorses active video games

ByBob Lawrence, MD

The well known "heart check logo" of the American Heart Association (AHA) may show up soon on more than just heart-healthy foods. Last week the AHA granted permission for Nintendo, the maker of the Wii video game system, to place a version of the AHA endorsement logo on games that meet the association's criteria for increasing physical activity.

This endorsement represents a change in the way the medical community views video games.

Obesity is now considered a public health epidemic in the United States, and for decades, video games were seen as part of the problem. To encourage more active play and athletic participation, the American Academy of Pediatrics guidelines previously recommended limiting screen time for children to only two hours daily.

But video games have become more active, and studies show that active games increase energy expenditure to levels similar to other forms of active play. For example, a study published in the journal Pediatrics in 2006 showed that playing a video game while seated increases energy expenditure only 20 percent above resting rates, but playing the active game Dance Dance Revolution (Konami Digital Entertainment) increased energy expenditure by 170 percent over resting rates.

Nintendo has agreed to donate $1.5 million to the American Heart Association as part of the new partnership, causing critics to question whether the AHA logo can be bought. However, the AHA insists the endorsement is targeted at people of all ages who are at increased risk of cardiovascular disease and diabetes mellitus due to inactivity. The AHA "Get Active" website now features children and adults playing the Nintendo Wii.

Certain Nintendo Wii games allow participants to play well-known sports like tennis, golf, bowling, bicycling, and boxing. The Wii Fit uses a balance board that will measure weight, calculate body mass index (BMI), and trend a player's fitness over time. The games tend to engage family members of all ages allowing grandparents and children to play along side, and often against, each other.

Interestingly, active video games like Wii Sports have brought on a new form of sports injury jokingly called "Nintenditis" or "Wii-itis." Just like any sports activity, active play on video games can cause overuse injuries like sore muscles, tendonitis, low back pain, and in severe cases, torn muscles or ligaments. But true injuries are rare, and most physicians would much prefer to hear active patients say, "I am having a little pain in my knees" than to hear inactive patients say, "I'm having a little pain in my chest."

No one endorses the idea that video games will replace the healthy aspects of authentic play or athletic participation, but the American Heart Association believes the Nintendo Wii provides a forum for otherwise sedentary patients to stay active and thereby lower their risk of cardiovascular disease.

So don't be ashamed to tell your doctor the new shoulder pain is from playing video games. He will likely approve. Just don't tell him it occurred while boxing with your grandkids.

New count, new outcome

Payenna recalled, council certifies all results

By Tyler Rhodes

The results of a recall election for all five of Nome's school board members shifted again Friday after a fourth counting of the ballots cast for Heather Payenna yielded the fourth different tally since election day May 25.

The hand count of 484 "Yes" votes to 478 "No" reversed Payenna's fate for the second time since election day; the most recent tally showing that a majority of voters cast ballots to remove her from the board. The previous hand recount, conducted a week earlier on May 28, showed Payenna retaining her seat by a one-vote margin. The initial count after the polls closed and a subsequent machine recount both showed Payenna being recalled.

The Nome Common Council met Monday for a special noon meeting at which it certified Payenna's election result, making Friday's count official. The council certified the results for the other four school board members at a special noon meeting held Friday prior to Payenna's recount. Although the vote tallies for most of the four members have changed between the initial count and subsequent recounts, the end results have remained firm with Albert McComas recalled and Barb Nickels, Gloria Karmun and Kirsten Timbers retained.

At Monday's meeting, Payenna was gracious in asking the board to certify the results and put the vote to rest. Noting that although the outcome was not what she had sought, Payenna asked that the election be concluded so that the community can move forward. "It's been really wearing," she said.

Airport, Snake River proposals meet turbulence

By Sandra L. Medearis

About 30 people collected at Old St. Joe's June 2 for a presentation from the state Department of Transportation, Federal Aviation Administration, and contract biologists and engineers on design options to meet a legislative mandate on improved airport safety.

Some options concerning Nome airport involve changing the course of the Snake River—again.

For the most part, the public, as in "public" input, did not like what they heard.

"It has never happened in Nome at a meeting like this that everyone was on the same side," Sue Steinacher said, laughing.

Department of Transportation planners showed several alternatives for reconfiguring Nome airport features to provide a greater safety margin. Main issues are lengthening the runway, expanding the safety area around the edges of runways, parallel taxiways, lengthening and pushing the primary runway north, even building a new general aviation facility at the airport. But in reality, DOT had to spread available annual federal funding over all airports in the state, so Nome was looking at only a minimal Band-aid solution.

That airport fix did not fly with those voicing a consensus that the main-east-west runway needed to move north out of the lowlands and the Snake River needed to stay right where it was. Moving the runway north would get it out of the flood plain, reduce the need for continual resurfacing because of settlement, and lower the number of delays because of fog, a number of people said to sounds of agreement.

"I'm wondering how much you have considered the size and growth of Nome?" Vic Olson, a long-time commercial pilot, said. "To go north should allow room for Nome to expand. If I had 600 feet of smooth gravel or grass, I'd be happy, but Nome is growing.

"You are building a runway for the way Nome is now," he said.

DOT's project manager, R.J. Stumpf, said going north currently bucks headwinds in land acquisition and other constraints.

Matt Johnson drew a parallel with Nome expansion and Anchorage's Merrill Field ending up surrounded with industrial growth.

The fixes under consideration would satisfy the legislative mandate for changes within five years to bring the runway safety area into compliance with federal FAA standards. The runway safety area is a cleared area surrounding the runway to help reduce the risk of damage to airplanes in the event of an undershoot, overshoot, or departure from the runway. A separate issue is updating to serve a long-term, 20-year plan for further safety improvements, regional economic support, orderly expansion patterns, accommodation of growth in passengers and newer, larger aircraft in service.

The DOT has a proposed solution for now to fit the money available.

The proposed "Band-aid" would provide the most effective solution for achieving full safety area compliance and may provide opportunity for lower approach minimums and greater accessibility to the Nome Airport. The proposed

- action would include the following upgrades:
 Improvements to address RSA deficiencies
- Relocating navigational aids and additional paving, as required due to threshold shifts
 - Relocation of access roads, as required
 - Relocation of the Snake River.

The Snake River winds around the existing runways creating a barrier to expanding the main runway embankment to the west and future im-

A better Nome, yes, annexation, no!

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission held an open house to collect ideas to feed Nome's comprehensive plan update.

Given the opportunity to say how they wanted to see Nome develop, including a sounding board on annexation of outlying areas, 12 to 15 active participants showed up, but these visitors were very productive.

Easels standing around the room at Old St. Joe's on June 3 gathered lots of ideas written on yellow sticky notes focusing on Nome's strengths, weaknesses and opportunities.

People attending had many ideas for improving the community, but little love for annexing outlying areas.

Two guys from the state Local Boundary Commission came to field questions and provide information on the annexation process, that so far, is just a tentative gleam in planners' eyes waiting to be fanned by any interest in the proposition.

Nome Joint Utility System is in the process of extending its service area, contract planner Eileen Bechtol told the gathering, so City of Nome is exploring the extension of city boundaries to match.

"It would be a totally open transparent process," Bechtol said.

"We're at the beginning. Nothing has been filed."

Still, a majority of the people in attendance had disaffection for annexation. Annexation would bring a yet undetermined property tax liability for a yet undefined level of city services. Cari Miller of Tripple Creek, who

Dear Editor,

My Grandmother Frieda Goodwin lived in Council, Chenik, and Golovin in the very early 1900s. She had a younger sister named Mable who married a white man named Ralph Williams. Her other younger sister married Tom Willock. I am interested in finding out if any these two families have descendants living in Nome or any other place.

Nancy,

Yesterday, I visited Caminada Bay in Grand Isle, Louisiana - one of the first places to feel the devastation wrought by the oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico. While I was here, at Camerdelle's Live Bait shop, I met with a group of local residents and small business owners.

They included Floyd Lasseigne, a fourth-generation oyster fisherman. This is the time of year when he ordinarily earns a lot of his income. But his oyster bed has likely been destroyed by the spill.

Terry Vegas had a similar story. He quit the 8th grade to become a shrimper with his grandfather. Ever since, he's earned his living during shrimping season — working long, grueling days so that he could earn enough money to support himself year-round. But today, the waters where he has worked are closed. And every day, as the spill worsens, he loses hope that he will be able to return to the life he built.

Here, this spill has not just damaged livelihoods. It has upended whole communities. And the fury people feel is not just about the money they have lost. It is about the wrenching recognition that this time their lives may never be the same.

Letters to the editor must be signed and include an address and phone number. Thank yous and political endorsements

Moving Forward

An elected public board or council needs to have the respect of its community. In order to gain that respect they have to be open and honest with the people who elected them. They must be willing to have open discussion in public meetings. They must not meet and act in secret and they must always follow the law. Public trust is a sacred responsibility.

Nome's been through a very ugly situation. Now we have to move on. What started as a citizen's initiative to show that the little guy has the power to recall a school board that was uncommunicative did not follow its own policies and did not allow for due process for employees turned into a hate-filled campaign based on basketball, race and rumor. The sad thing is that the public still does not know why the board removed the two principals. The board should go back and offer due process to the two principals who were denied fir treatment. We will also have to appoint at least two new board members. Let's not make this more complicated than a Supreme Court confirmation.

Let's hope that our school board understands that it does not have a mandate. Let's also hope that they realize the citizens who put them in office and pay taxes are mature and wise enough to deal with honest discussion and answers. If there are concerns about who did or didn't get to play enough basketball, who got their feelings hurt, or thinks they aren't getting fair treatment, then for pity's sake say it and deal with it in a timely manner. Don't micromanage or backstab. Be rational adults. We need to move forward. -N.L.M.-

These people work hard. They meet their responsibilities. But now because of a manmade catastrophe one that is not their fault and beyond their control — their lives have been thrown into turmoil. It is brutally unfair. And what I told these men and women is that I will stand with the people of the Gulf Coast until they are again made whole.

That is why, from the beginning, we have worked to deploy every tool at our disposal to respond to this crisis. Today, there are more than 20,000 people working around the clock to contain and clean up this spill. I have authorized 17,500 National Guard troops to participate in the response. More than 1,900 vessels are aiding in the containment and cleanup effort. We have convened hundreds of top scientists and engineers from around the world. This is the largest response to an environmental disaster of this kind in the history of our country.

We have also ordered BP to pay economic injury claims, and this week, the federal government sent BP a preliminary bill for $69 million to pay back American taxpayers for some of the costs of the response so far. In addition, after an emergency safety review, we are putting in place aggressive new operating standards for offshore drilling. And I have appointed a bipartisan commission to look into the causes of this spill. If laws are inadequate, they will be changed. If oversight was lacking, it

By Rep. Neal Foster The Veto Pen

Governor Sean Parnell held a press conference June 3 announcing his final budget package. Operating, Capital, and Supplemental budgets were all addressed and signed. There were line item vetoes in the Operating and Capital budgets. The governor framed his vetoes as a robust package that was also fiscally responsible, or in his words "We will grow Alaska by investing in infrastructure while spending less and saving more for the future." I would note that at this point in the process, this really is all the governor can do. Once the legislature has passed a budget, the governor can only reject it (entirely or by line item) or accept it. He cannot add to it. The governor reduced the operating and capital budgets by $336 million through line-item vetoes. The vast majority of these vetoes were in the Capital Budget.

Capital Budget Vetoes

The governor vetoed $300,157,230 in Capital Budget expenditures. These are the projects and purchases that affect our small communities the most. The majority of the projects for house district 39 stayed intact with only one project being reduced. The projects eliminated by the governor were an emergency shelter in Nome, a public safety building in Pilot Station, and planning for an assisted living facility in Unalakleet. I was surprised when I saw that these projects were the ones selected for elimination, particularly concerning Pilot Station and Unalakleet. At the outset of the press conference Parnell said that he would leave funding for fire stations intact. While the public safety building in Pilot Station would not have been exclusively used by the local volunteer fire department, it would have been used by them for meetings and training. All they currently have is a storage Connex. The assisted living facility in Unalakleet was also a project I would have expected him to support. In the presentation the governor defended the same types of facilities elsewhere in the state as long-term savings in the operating budget. Indian Health Service facilities receive 100 percent federal reimbursements on qualified patients. If that same patient is in a non-IHS facility they only receive 50 percent reimbursement. There are very few assisted living facilities right now that are operated by IHS. The Unalakleet facility would have saved the state money and allowed elders to stay closer to home. Overall nearly 90 percent of the vetoes were in the Capital Budget. While I respect the governor's prerogative in exercising fiscal restraint, the message that I have emphasized is rural Alaska has a shortage of the most basic services and infrastructure.

Operating Budget Vetoes

"My initial spending plan limited growth in state agency budgets to 2.2 percent, which was a significant reduction from the 10 percent that was requested," Governor Parnell said. "The legislature shares my concerns with the size of the budget and maintained that budget discipline as they worked on the operating budget." $35,933,000 of these reductions come from removing fiscal notes from bills that either did not pass or were vetoed. When a bill is introduced it rarely has zero fiscal impact. So the departments affected by the prospective new law will draft a "fiscal note" which tells the legislature what they expect it to cost. These notes have their own section in the operating budget. These vetoes do not reflect a real reduction in the operating budget. The only real bone of contention centers around the funding for SB 13 (Denali KidCare) which increased qualified recipients to households earning 200 percent of the federal poverty level. The governor said yesterday that he would not sign this bill into law. This will leave qualified households in Alaska at 175 percent of the federal poverty level. The question here is not whether it was appropriate to cut spending for a bill, which will not become law. The question is why it would be appropriate to block legislation that would provide medical care to an additional 1,300 Alaskan kids and provide over 200 pregnant women with

More bills signed

Catching up with signing bills handed to the Governor's office, Sean Parnell signed Senate Bill 284 to strengthen state campaign disclosure requirements. The law amends state election statutes to clarify that corporations and labor unions are covered by the existing reporting requirements. The requirements extend to both candidate and ballot measure elections. The bill is designed to amend the campaign finance law to ensure that all independent expenditures are reported to the Alaska Public Offices Commission and are made public. The legislation follows the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that the First Amendment permits corporations to make independent expenditures in candidate elections.

In order to give a boost to geothermal power projects and to produce more affordable and reliable electric power for homes and businesses, Parnell signed Senate Bill 243 last week. The bill encourages safe exploration and development of geothermal energy. The bill moves jurisdiction over the permitting and inspection of geothermal wells and operations from the Department of Natural Resources to the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission.

Governor Parnell also signed Senate Bill 277, a law that exempts facilities that generate electricity entirely from renewable energy resources from regulation when that electricity is sold to regulated utilities. This legislation came about in response to the Fire Island Wind project currently developed by the CIRI with the prospect to sell power to rail belt utilities.

Alaska Supreme Court allows ballot initiative on parental notification

A ballot item put to the voters this fall is a citizen's initiative on parental notice for a minor's abortion. The Alaska Supreme Court decided to allow the citizens of Alaska the opportunity to vote after Planned Parenthood last year challenged Lieutenant Governor Craig Campbell's summary for the petition booklets. Earlier this year, the Superior Court found that the summary was misleading because it omitted information, including that a doctor failed to give the required notice to parents before performing an abortion on a minor could eat fresh.

State sues feds over beluga ESA listing

The State of Alaska sued the federal government to challenge the listing of Cook Inlet beluga whales as endangered under the Endangered Species Act. Attorney general Dan Sullivan said that the state is filing suit against the National Marine Fisheries Service. The Department of Law spent a lot of time reviewing information about how the endangered listing was reached and concluded that NMFS didn't adequately consider listing the whales as threatened, rather than endangered. The Parnell administration has submitted comments expressing concern about the proposed designation of critical habitat for Cook Inlet belugas. The state's concern is that a critical habitat designation threatens to stifle economic activity at the Port of Anchorage. The legislature and the governor have approved $1 million to implement the state's strategy to fight ESA decisions that the state fears could stifle the development of natural resources in Alaska.

Don Young introduces bill to delist polar bear as threatened

Alaska Congressman Don Young last week introduced a short bill that would delist polar bears as a threatened species.

In May 2008, the US Secretary of the Interior Dirk Kempthorne listed polar bears as threatened. The species became the first listing as a victim of climate change that melts the animal's sea ice habitat. Young maintains that there is a consistent increase in polar bear populations. The proposed act simply reads

Showdown in Murkowski

In a town hall meeting in Talkeetna last week U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski announced that a landmark decision in Congress will happen on June 10, when her disapproval resolution regarding the Environmental Protection Agency is up to be voted on. The debate is whether EPA should regulate greenhouse gases under the Clean Air Act. If Murkowski's resolution passes, it would block the EPA from enforcing emissions rules under the Clean Air Act. The disapproval resolution needs only a simple majority of 51 votes to pass the Senate and is supported by 41 other Senators. Murkowski said that she wants to see the legislative branch rather than unelected bureaucrats in the executive branch lead the way in addressing climate change.

Arctic ice at low point

Researchers led by the Ohio State University have concluded that there is less ice covering the Arctic today than at any time in recent geologic history. The international group of researchers has compiled the first comprehensive history of Arctic ice and presents their study in an upcoming issue of Quarternary Science Reviews. Leonid Polyak, the lead author of the study said that the ice loss that started in the early 20th Century and sped up during the last 30 years appears to be unmatched over at least the last few thousand years. Polyak and his collaborators plan an expedition next year to draw cores from beneath the Chukchi Sea. The currents originating from the northern Pacific Ocean bring heat that may play an important role in melting the ice across the Arctic, and Polyak expects that the history of this location will prove very important. He hopes to drill cores that date back thousands of years at the Chukchi Sea margin, providing a detailed history of interaction between oceanic currents

Port commission forms budget, pans river relocation

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Port Commission forwarded a draft port budget for FY 2011 to the Common Council on June 4 following an hour-long work session with City Comptroller Cussy Kauer. The proposed budget is based on projected revenues of $1.3 million.

Kauer provided stacks of detailed information about the port's current budget and draft FY 2011 budget to the commission. She explained that the Port of Nome is an enterprise fund and is part of the City of Nome, not a separate entity with its own tax identification number. (In governmental accounting, an enterprise fund provides goods or services to the public for a fee that makes the entity self-supporting.)

During a May 27 meeting of the Port Commission, Chairman Jim West Jr. had requested a work session with Kauer to clarify questions about revenues available to the port. He wanted to know whether any funds were left over from the Cape Nome Quarry repair project to use for the port.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency provided funds to repair damage to the Cape Nome Jetty caused by a storm in 2004 following disaster declarations by both the state and federal governments. Repair work originally scheduled in 2008 was delayed until 2009. Knik Construction completed the project last fall.

The draft port budget shows revenues of $3 million from FEMA and expenditures of $2.57 million for the Cape Nome Quarry in FY 2010. No revenues from the project are included in the port's proposed budget for FY 2011.

Kauer told the commissioners all funds for the project have been spent. She explained that the City of Nome bore the expense of administering the project because administrative costs could not be paid until the project was completed. Among project costs incurred by the city were annual audits, she added. Kauer also provided the commissioners with background information on other major line items in the port budget.

"I see nothing that slaps me in the face," Commissioner Jeff Darling of the port's draft FY2011 budget. "It's a lot to look at and digest."

"It's overwhelming," said Commissioner Charlie Lean, adding that he can find no major problems with the budget.

Harbormaster Joy Baker noted that the projected cost for professional services to prepare a port and harbor development plan has been reduced from $40,000 to $30,000 in the projected budget, as directed by the commission at its May 27 meeting.

Other port issues

During a regular meeting immediately following the work session on June 4, the port commission unanimously recommended that the Nome Common Council approve a proposed ordinance to lease land to the U.S. Coast Guard to install two range marker lights on municipal property for safe navigation of the entrance to the Nome harbor. The council has scheduled a second reading, public hearing and final action on the proposed ordinance at a special meeting at noon on June 21.

The commission decided to postpone discussion of a draft request for proposals to prepare a port and harbor development plan.

The City of Nome's proposal for a high mast lighting project at the port was not funded by the Coastal Community Impact Assistance Program, reported Sally Russell Cox, CCIAP program manager in a letter to City Manager Josie Bahnke. Bahnke received the letter June 3 and provided copies of it to each commissioner. Baker said she hopes the city will continue to seek funding for the project.

Lean presented a final draft of his letter to Mayor Denise Michels and the council in which he argues against proposals to relocate the Snake River as part of the state Department of Transportation's expansion of the Nome airport.

Baker said DOT officials who conducted a public meeting on the airport expansion project June 2 in Nome told her that a proposal to completely remove the entrance to the Snake River is off the table, but they want to receive Lean's letter.

Lean said he is glad that DOT does not plan to move the river out to sea. He read aloud the following paragraph that he added to his final draft about a proposal to reroute the river through permafrost.

"The idea of rerouting the river through deep permafrost tundra and back into the existing channel is less damaging to the City, but still a costly option," Lean wrote. "For nearly two decades, the effluent from Dredge #6 was drained into the Snake River from exactly the area that is proposed as a reroute option. This caused extensive siltation and required a harbor dredge to work for most of each summer to keep the Port open. The permafrost soil is glacial till, fully saturated mix of gravel and fines with some clay. The riparian corridor substrate is primarily sand and alluvial gravel with very little fines. The first year of such a relocation would produce massive siltation. The diagrams and discussion of the relocation cut [were] not reassuring in that a balance between the cost of excavation and providing a low angle of repose for the new river banks and a flood plain to dissipate the spring water surge seemed to be all about short term cost savings, with little concern for siltation or bank erosion. The road cuts on that same former beach bench between Farley's Camp and Hastings Creek are still sloughing today, 15 years after construction. The City will be forced to address the harbor maintenance costs caused by the cost cutting measures of an overly narrow new channel construction.'

Commissioners Jimmy Adams, Darling and West co-signed Lean's letter. Newly appointed Commissioner Cam Kristenson was out of town.

provements of the airport (the runway cannot be extended or moved to the east due to obstructions). The Snake River channel would be relocated from a take-off point approximately 5,000 feet upstream of the main runway, routed through an approximately 5,500-foot long channel to a reconnection south of the main runway.

Mike Quinn wants to find the river right where it is now.

"People will sue you and I will give them money, because I don't want to see the [Snake] river moved. You're a lot better going north and not putting money into the existing runway," he said.

"It's a waste of money," Laura Samuelson said. "It's silly we're even talking about this.'

It made no sense to Carl Emmons that money would go into the existing runway, but then a 20-year plan would move it north. "If you do this Bandaid plan, then the master plan is just a horse and pony show," Emmons said.

DOT gets $200 million a year to spread over all the state's airports, DOT representatives said.

"Ninety-five percent is federally funded. If the state had another heyday, we wouldn't have to deal with restraints," said Anne Brooke, public meeting facilitator retained by PDC Inc. Engineers on the planning project.

A long-term, 20-year master plan could have the following highlights among many other improvements:

City Field operations moving to Nome Airport, lengthening existing runways, shifting the crosswind runway to the north to increase safety and moving the primary runway to the north.

Reported number of airplane boardings for 2008 was 59,978. Projections for 20 years into the future increase that number to 67,601. In the next six to 20 years, the Nome airport will be receiving new 737-800 aircraft under the Alaska Airlines banner, requiring a 7,500-foot primary runway.

Another input meeting in Nome is on the calendar for Sept. 17. For more information on airport plans, go to the highly informative Web site: www.nomeairport.com.

Marine Advisory agents funded in Nome, 5 other sites

Laurie McNicholas

The Alaska Legislature and the University of Alaska have funded Marine Advisory Program agents in Nome and five other communities throughout the state, reports MAP program leader Paula Cullenberg.

This means the Nome MAP office, which closed in March when a three-year grant from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. ended, will reopen with permanent funding.

The University of Alaska's budget request to the Legislature included $600,000 to permanently fund MAP positions in Cordova, Dillingham, Petersburg and Unalaska, all of which operated with short-term grants slated to end within a year; Kodiak, which has been unfunded for more than a decade, and Nome. The Legislature approved half of the request-$300,000—and the university reallocated an additional $300,000 for the positions. However, funding remained uncertain until last week when Gov. Sean Parnell released his vetoes in the state's operating and capital budgets. He did not veto the legislative appropriation in support of MAP.

"It was very clear throughout the process that the wide range of community support made the difference," Cullenberg said. Public testimony and letters to the Legislature from across the state included municipal and tribal governments, fishing associations, tourism operators, educators, environmental groups and industry representatives.

"Since this funding is part of the University of Alaska's operating budget, it is continual funding and these six MAP positions will be permanent university faculty positions," Cullenberg noted. "These funds allows us to make commitments to these communities and invest in long-term projects. We will be able to really think beyond the focus of a particular funding grant that we had in the past. With permanently funded MAP agents, we can address and have an impact on issues that are important to the region and the community."

Cullenberg said residents in the Bering Strait region are interested in fisheries development and involving youth and adults in local science activities. "There is significant national interest in the Arctic, and the MAP agent can help to ensure that this information is available in the region and that local residents are involved," she added.

MAP hopes to advertise the Nome position in August, Cullenberg said. "When we can fill it really depends on whether we get good applicants," she said. "The minimum requirement is a master's degree in natural sciences or a related field. We will try to go as quickly as possible."

Heidi Herter served as Nome's MAP agent for three years until the office closed last March. This summer she is working for the U.S. Geological Survey in Juneau.

The Alaska Sea Grant Marine Advisory Program is a statewide university extension and technical assistance program at the UAF School of Fisheries and Ocean Sciences.

Sound on Sunday. An aerial survey by a biologist from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. documented 112 tons of herring near Elim.

The Icicle Seafoods processor RM Thorstenson and the tenders have arrived in Norton Sound. Water temperature readings on Sunday recorded by the vessels in central Norton Sound were nearly 40°F. The water temperature near Besboro Island was 33°F. To the north by Elim the water temperature was nearly 40°F.

With water temperatures nearing 40°F and air temperatures expected to reach 60°F for the next several days, herring will be begin to ripen. There are more than 8,000 tons of herring on the quota, and Norton Sound Seafood Products, in contract with Icicle Seafoods, is interested in buying 1,000 tons.

The department opened the fish-flexibility for the buyer. Fishermen will need to check with Norton Sound Seafood Products at 624-3014 or VHF channel 5 to see when the buyer is able to purchase herring. Icicle tenders also can be reached on VHF channel 5.

Commercial fishermen are required to have a Norton Sound commercial herring permit and a government-issued photo identification. Any crewmember helping with fishing operations must have a crewmember's license regardless of age. The only substitute for the crewmember license is possession of a commercial permit for a State of Alaska fishery. For example, a commercial herring, commercial salmon or commercial crab permit can be used as a crewmember's license. Crewmembers' licenses can be purchased at the Unalakleet AC store, the Nome ADF&G office or on-line at the State of Alaska website https://www.admin.adfg.state.ak.us/ buyonline.

For more information, contact the ADF&G Nome office at 443-5167 or 1-800-560-2271, or the Unalakleet office at (907) 624-3921.

ACATS: Environmental pollutants cause cancer

Why do people get cancer? What causes it? Is it genetics? Is it the environment? Despite the decades-old war on cancer, women today are much more likely to develop breast cancer than any previous generation.

Last week the Alaska Community Action on Toxics brought Sarah Dunagan, staff scientist for the Silent Spring Institute to Nome to present a lecture on the environmental links and opportunities for prevention of cancer. Dunagan presented research on breast cancer. However other types of cancers also have links to environmental toxins.

Statistics from the 1940s indicate that a woman's lifetime risk for breast cancer was one in 22. Today the risk is one in 7. Perhaps this means that factors other than genetics-perhaps environmental pollutants are an issue. According to

Silent Spring,we simply don't know as much as we should about the impact of environmental pollutants.

Laboratory tests show that there are three main ways that chemical pollutants can cause breast cancer: They can cause tumors, they can cause hormone disruption and they can affect development from embryo through puberty, pregnancy and throughout adulthood.

Dunagan says that chemicals in plastic, flame-retardants, construction materials, and pesticides should give folks concern about cancer causing agents in the environment. In western Alaska people should be concerned about military contaminants, polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) in the food supply, aromatic hydrocarbons from vehicle exhaust and air pollution, disinfectants, chlorinated solvents, plastic food containers, the lining of food cans, and furniture made of plastics. There are at least 216 environmental carcinogens that can cause breast cancer. Ionizing radiation such as X-Rays and medical scanners can also cause cancers.

Dunagan says we should encourage our legislators to pass the Safe Chemical Act of 2010 to make sure manufacturers test their products for chemical safety.

Pamela Miller of ACAT points out that there are things that folks can do to cut down on environmental contamination in their homes:

- Remove shoes indoors; use a doormat.
- · Clean with vinegar, baking soda, soap and water.
- Cook in glass, steel or ceramic.
- Keep dust levels low; vacuum

Funds to bring Dunagan to Alaska were generated through the Alaska Women's Run.

Hunters found safe after taking shelter from bad weather

Four whale hunters from Koyuk got a Coast Guard helicopter ride home after bad weather forced the men to beach their skiff and take shelter at a remote cabin near Island Point Steven Hoogendorn, Steven Hoogendorn Jr., Clarance Dooley and Arian Nassak became the subject of the Coast Guard search after they were reported missing by the Alaska State Troopers in the early morning hours of June 1. According to the Coast Guard, the four departed Koyuk around noon May 30 and were expected to return Monday morning. The whale hunters were reported last seen at Bald Head, southwest of Koyuk, and on their way to Cape Denbigh, which is directly south of Bald Head on the opposite side of Norton Bay.

The Coast Guard launched a HC-130 Hercules aircraft and MH-60 Jayhawk helicopter the morning of June 1 to search for the group. It was a Good Samaritan pilot who spotted the 16-foot skiff beached near a shelter cabin at Island Point around 11:15 a.m. June 1. The Coast Guard plane had been searching the open water while the helicopter examined the shoreline.

The Coast Guard reported northwest winds at 13 mph that were gusting to 22 mph on Tuesday morning. The Coast Guard encourages all boaters to carry a VHF marine band radio to contact the Coast Guard in the event of an emergency and to file a float plan with family, friends and the harbormaster before a trip.

Night leg cramps: What treatment works?

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Many people experience the often annoying, sometimes debilitating, sudden onset of involuntary muscle contractions in the leg or foot, defined as muscle cramps. The problem often occurs at night, lasting from seconds to several minutes and can be very disruptive to normal sleep patterns. From a medical point of view, the muscle cramps are rarely a sign of serious illness, but to a person who suffers from frequent spasms, the muscle cramps can be a frustrating problem because there are many possible causes and no single treatment works for everyone.

Nighttime muscle cramps can afflict any person of any age, but the problem is most commonly seen in three different groups: children and teenagers during periods of growth; persons over age 65; and women during pregnancy.

Most of the time, the cause of leg cramps cannot be identified. Cramps likely occur more frequently, and with more intensity, when a person is dehydrated or there is a shift in the balance of minerals or electrolytes in the muscles (low potassium, sodium, calcium, or magnesium). People with flat feet or ill-fitting shoes will often have foot cramps at night.

Patients who take diuretics for blood pressure, congestive heart failure, or edema may experience night-time cramps. Statins, a group of drugs used to treat high cholesterol, cause muscle cramps in some patients. The blood sugar changes associated with diabetes mellitus can also worsen leg cramps. Pain when lying down that immediately improves when hanging the leg over the side of the bed is common in patients with peripheral artery disease.

Other possible causes include rapid increase in athletic activity; thyroid disease; use of oral hormones (as with contraceptives); prednisone therapy; excessive alcohol use; and kidney disease.

There is no single cure for nighttime muscle cramps. Unproven, sometimes bizarre, home remedies include drinking pickle juice, drinking tonic water, taking a spoonful of yellow mustard, mixing a small amount of baking soda in a glass of water, or drinking an oral rehydration fluid, like Pedialyte, before bed. Experts do not endorse any one of these remedies, but they do recognize that these and other home remedies are used widely and seem to benefit some people.

For years, doctors could prescribe a medication called quinine sulfate to treat patients with muscle cramps. Though quinine sulfate is only FDA approved to treat malaria, in some patients it reduces the frequency of nighttime muscle cramps. For this reason quinine was often marketed for the treatment of leg cramps. Unfortunately, quinine was found to cause potentially deadly heart arrhythmias and bleeding disorders. Therefore, in 2006, the FDA banned the sale of all leg-cramp drugs in the U.S. containing quinine. The only remaining medication licensed by the FDA containing quinine is called Qualaquin, which is only approved for treatment of certain forms of cramps, successful treatment requires identifying and addressing the most likely causes. If dehydration is the cause, rehydration is the cure. If there is an electrolyte or mineral imbalance, then replacing potassium, sodium, calcium, and/or magnesium should reduce the frequency of symptoms (this is how many home remedies work). Supportive shoes may help people with flat feet. Many people find it helpful to stretch the leg muscles for about five minutes before lying down at night. A warm shower or massage of the affected muscle group is also helpful.

Talk to your provider about alternatives if common remedies do not work. Sometimes the muscle spasms are secondary to a more serious underlying problem, so see your doctor about a medical evaluation:

If the cramps are frequently waking you from sleep;

If there are other signs of illness like heart palpitations, frequent urination, visual changes, or pain with walking;

If you notice muscle weakness and loss of muscle tone over time;

If you have had gastric bypass surgery (increases risk of certain vitamin deficiencies);

If pain is associated with swelling of the leg;

If you have known heart, liver, or kidney disease; or

If you experience worsening muscle cramps while taking a medication for high cholesterol.

Once the underlying cause of muscle cramps is identified and treated, most people find nighttime cramps become less frequent and less severe.

In her short run as a candidate and school board member, Payenna has seen the election process inside and out. Her initial run for the board required a second election as she had a lead but not a sufficient majority to gain the seat outright. She went on to beat Lynette Schmidt in the runoff vote. Payenna's route off the board was even more convoluted. Although it only required one trip to the polls, four separate counting of the ballots were needed before the Nome Common Council would certify the vote.

Citing the inconsistencies between the counts and questions over the total number of ballots cast and the handling of those that were questionably marked, several citizens approached the council at the June 4 meeting to ask that the ballots for Timbers be recounted by hand a second time along with Payenna's. "We just want something that everyone can agree on," Julie Kelso said.

Others argued that the results of Timbers' hand recount should stand. Citizen Barb Amarok, who said she sat in on the entire hand recount for both board members May 28, told the council she was comfortable with the process. "I thought the manual recount was done very professionally," she said.

Payenna's mother, Mo Koezuna, addressed the board to question how just a couple of the board members could be recalled when the grounds for the vote were that the entire board violated their policies and rules by improperly holding a closed meeting and discussing two district employees. "How could you have some violate and not all violate?" Koezuna asked at the June 4 meeting.

Councilman Randy Pomeranz made an effort at the June 4 meeting to remove Timbers' name from the list of election results to be certified so that another hand recount could be conducted, but his motion failed for a lack of a second. When the subsequent vote came around to certify all results except those for Payenna, Pomeranz was outvoted 4-1. Timbers' results were then made final along with those for Karmun, Nickels and McComas.

Out of the five board members, Timbers and Payenna had the narrowest margins between the votes to either retain or recall them. With the results that close, city officials decided to run a machine recount of the ballots May 26, the day following the election. While the numbers shifted for all tallies except Nickels', the outcome of all votes remained the same.

A recount of the recount

The minor change of a couple votes one way or the other as a result of the May 26 machine recount did not signify that the outcome could differ for McComas or Karmun if a hand recount were performed. The machine count, however, only tightened the results for Timbers and Payenna. After the machine recount, the standing figures showed voters deadlocked on Timbers 478-478 and Payenna still being recalled—but now by only six votes at 481-475. In a recall vote, a tie means the individual remains in office.

Rather than confirm the outcome, the machine recount only fueled suspicions that the totals did not accurately reflect what was cast at the polls. At the common council's May 27 meeting that was set to certify the results, the council accepted two requests for a hand recount of both Timbers' and Payenna's ballots. The council postponed its certification of the race for all candidates.

Staged the next day, the hand recount seemed to only further muddy the water. For Timbers, the recount added votes to both the "Yes" and "No" columns, and showed her retaining her seat by a two-vote cushion of 482-484. For Payenna, the results showed her total vote count dropping and her board seat preserved with a one-vote margin to retain, 477-478.

Within hours of that count, however, City Clerk Sandy Babcock was writing the council to suggest that Payenna's recount be continued due to a question over the number of ballots counted. "In re-adding the tally sheets and invalid ballot totals tonight it looks like we have mis-counted the Red Ballots for Heather Payenna," Babcock wrote in an e-mail addressed to the council members, the mayor, city manager and city attorney. "It appeared at the time that we were doing everything we could to insure accuracy, however we did not verify the ballots at the end to see if all of them were accounted for and matched to 975 (the ballots cast for this seat). I come up with 970."

Babcock said in her e-mail there were 975 ballots cast for Payenna on election night and suggested that ballots may have stuck together during the manual recount. The May 28 hand recount produced 477 yes votes, 478 no votes, four blank ballots and 11 ballots that were ruled invalid for a total of 970.

The total votes for Timbers, according to both the initial machine count May 25 and hand recount May 28, remained at 976. In her e-mail to the council, Babcock said the one-ballot difference between Timbers and Payenna—who was supposed to have 975—could be attributed to an extra spoiled ballot in Payenna's race.

Payenna's ballot discrepancy persuaded the council to initiate another recount for the one school board member June 4, pending a count and comparison of the ballots and signatures on the voter rolls. Before starting a hand recount June 4, election workers first needed to count to see how many voters had signed in to vote, either on election day or when they submitted their absentee ballot application, and also count the number of ballots cast in Payenna's race. If a discrepancy was found, the election workers were then tasked with performing the hand recount.

As most who were in the common council chambers suspected June 4, a discrepancy was unearthed. A total of 974 ballots were counted and 975 signatures were found to be on the books. While the process did not result in a reason for the apparent missing ballot, the results satisfied the council which certified the election on Monday.

hand recount for Payenna produced other changes. Three more ballots that were previously considered invalid were counted in the second hand recount. In the second hand count eight ballots were deemed invalid, compared to 11 in the first hand recount.

In the second recount, those observing the process were able to get a much closer view of the process with the aid of a video camera and television screen. The camera, situated above the table on which the ballots sat, was able to display the ballots clearly to the audience in the room. The requirement that those who are not election judges or clerks be at least 10 feet away from the ballots kept the public from being able to observe ballots that were deemed questionable during the first hand count May 28.

The method appeared to settle public concerns over which ballots were deemed valid or invalid, allowing everyone a view of the questionable markings as the judges debated. "I think everyone did everything possible that the results were final and fairly arrived at," said Kelso, who observed the June 4 recount. Kelso did, however, push for the same method to be employed for a recount of Timbers' ballots.

What now?

With the Nome Common Council's certification of all of the recall vote results, the drawn out election is officially over. The outcome has left the Nome Board of Education with two fewer members. Karmun, Nickels and Timbers are now tasked with filling the two open seats.

The board was scheduled to meet June 8, after the Nugget went to press. Karmun said the board would most likely be discussing the process for filling the two vacant seats.

The district is currently advertising for candidates to submit letters of interest either by mail or by person to Bill Gartung in the district office. Those appointed to the board would serve until the fall elections.

Letters of interest are due by 4 p.m., June 15 and can be sent to Bill Gartung, Nome Public Schools, PO Box 131, Nome, AK 99762.

It was not too long ago that the board went through the appointment process after Karmun resigned last summer. (Karmun regained a seat on the board in the fall when she ran for election).

The process used last summer invited interested candidates to submit a letter of interest. Candidates were then questioned at a public meeting and scored by board members on their response. Three candidates expressed interest by letter for the open seat—Joe Miller, Joel Alowa and Lynette Schmidt. Only Schmidt and Alowa showed for the July 28 meeting. The two hopefuls received identical scores from the board members, requiring a coin toss to determine who would serve out Karmun's term. Schmidt won the toss.

Committee recommends Gast for Nome-Beltz principal

The committee tasked with deciding who will sit at the principal's desk at Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School next year unanimously gave their support to one of the two leading candidates after a public interview June 2.

Nome Public Schools Superintendent Jon Wehde said he would honor that recommendation and nominate Steve Gast for the job at the school board meeting scheduled for June 8. The board was to vote on Gast's hire at the meeting held after The Nugget went to press.

Gast's selection by the committee came after he and the other finalist for the job, Rod Pruitt, sat down for final interviews with Wehde during a public meeting held June 2. The hour-long interviews allowed each candidate to share his background and experience and give his view on a wide range of topics through answering nine prepared questions.

Gast spent the majority of his teaching and administrative career in Texas, where he said he worked at a number of schools similar in size to Nome-Beltz. If approved by the school board, this would be Gast's first job in Alaska. He is originally from Wisconsin.

Gast said his motivation to come to Alaska came as his career was at a transition point. He said he had spent the last year taking care of his father, before his passing, back in Wisconsin. After losing his parents, and with his children grown and on their own, Gast said he was ready for new opportunities. "I wanted to come to Alaska, I didn't put my resume out everywhere," he said during his interview.

Gast said his background also includes being the principal of two new schools in their first years of service as well as extensive coaching experience in football and basketball.

Pruitt's career in education had taken him all over Alaska and beyond. He said he has just come out of a brief retirement to keep working. "I feel I still have more to offer, I don't want to quit," he said.

He said he had worked in small districts in Southeast and in the Lake and Peninsula School District. He has also worked closer to Nome, having been in Deering for two years and Selawik for a year. Many of Pruitt's previous posts were held for a year or two.

When Pruitt spoke of potentially becoming principal at Nome-Beltz, he made it sound like he would be more of a transition figure than a mainstay. "I have no career aspirations. I have no ladders to climb," he said, noting that he would stay one or two years, "if I can assist you. If you can make use of me."

Pruitt's comments came as he acknowledged the situation that led to the two candidates sitting for interviews that evening. In January, the Nome Board of Education voted to not renew the contracts for principal Janeen Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer for reasons that have never been publicly stated.

The move spurred outrage from a vocal set of community members and ultimately led to a recall effort that put all five school board members on the ballot (see story on front page). The issue has proved incredibly divisive in the community, further evidenced by the near even results of the recall votes. "I wouldn't pretend to say I'm not aware of the stress the community has been under lately," Pruitt said. "I appreciate the endurance of the community."

Superintendent Wehde praised both candidates, noting he would have filled both vacancies at the junior high/high school campus had one of the candidates been willing to play second fiddle. "I've worked for both kinds of principal, each brings a skill set," Wehde said. "It would be nice to have them both." Wehde said both candidates were asked if they would be interested in the open assistant principal job, pending the outcome of the interview process. Both declined. 'These guys are leaders," he said.

The effort to fill the assistant principal position has to yet to yield any fruit. Boyer has made it known that he wanted his job back. The only reason that has been given for his job being cut was for budgetary reasons. With the position now included in the budget for next year, board member Barb Nickels has tried to put Boyer's rehire up to a vote at board meetings. She has failed to gain support from fellow board members to bring the question to a vote.

Nome Elementary leadership in limbo

If approved by the board, Gast would be the second administrator hired by the district in recent months. At a May 11 board meeting, Wehde reported David Keller will return to the district as a principal at one of the district's schools while also directing the special education program. In a later interview, Wehde said he would be inclined to have Keller serve as the elementary school if the position opens.

Nome Elementary School principal Shari Biscotti was on paid administrative from April 1 to May 24 after it was discovered her administrative credentials had been revoked in California just as she started working in Nome last year. Biscotti's standing with Nome Public Schools is in limbo while a state board investigates her credentials.

Wehde said the state investigation is still pending and Biscotti has been on medical leave since May 24. Wehde said Keller will be assigned a position in the district once Biscotti's status with the district is confirmed one way or the other.

33 Nomeites tackle annual Stroke-n-Croak Triathlon

The day before the 2010 Stroken-Croak Triathlon, Phil Hofstetter sent out an online posting saying that he "woke up sick, sick, sick."

"Quick, quick," would have been an appropriate posting for

It was either an illness of the 24hour variety, or Hofstetter simply soldiered through the pain to claim the win by more than eight minutes in Nome's annual swim-bike-run race Sunday. It took an hour and 24 minutes for Hofstetter to finish the triathlon that features a one-mile swim, a run of more than four miles and a bike ride of more than eight miles.

On a sunny Sunday that felt warmer than the official temperature of 41 degrees, 33 Nomeites took to the pool, pounded the pavement and pedaled their way through the race. Approximately half the field completed the race individually while the rest handled one or two segments as part of a team.

Leading the charge for the women competing on their own was Mary than a half minute ahead of runnerup Christina DiMaria. Nicholai Olson claimed the runner-up honors in the individual men's race with a time of 1:32:58.

In the team competition, Hofstetter's quick swim and Jamie Burford's speed in the running and biking legs gave the duo the quickest co-ed team time of 1:31:37. The fastest all-woman team was comprised of Andrea Painter, Mori Jack-Busk and Laureli Kinneen, who finished in 1:48:28.

The Stroke-n-Croak, a fundraiser for Nome's swim team, starts at the pool at the Nome-Beltz campus for the swim. The run takes competitors from the school to the Nome Recreation Center. The bike portion sends participants back to the school where they make a U-turn to return to the rec center for the finish.

Vandals wreak havoc at Glacier Creek cabin

By Cussy Kauer

Ah, and how was your weekend? Did everyone get out and participate in some way in our spring clean-up, either in or around our community, at your campsite, or in your own back yard? What a sense of relief! All cleaned up and ready to enjoy. Now, bring on the heat! Bring on summer! I am so looking forward to this summer, our upcoming Midnight Sun Festival events, my older sisters' visits, my daughter Rajene and her children coming to celebrate my niece Sandra's wedding to that handsome Russell Rowe.

My Friday was unremarkable, only that the work day was a little longer as I met with Harbormaster Joy Baker and her Port Commissioners well past city hall closing time. Friday evenings for me are usually spent close to my telephone in case our gals or guys need me to help them with something at the bar. This Friday was no different, and I wanted a little more down time, because I had again volunteered as part of the community clean up campaign to be a truck sitter, representing Nome Alumni. That $100 each truck sitter organization gets for spending seven hours passing out tickets and clean-ing around their area of town is much needed for my scholarships I pass out each year. At the age I am getting to be, I needed extra rest, because Saturday was going to be a long, long day.

Saturday morning, earlier than usual, I tended to my duties to ready the bar for the day, so that I would be on time and on location at my favorite truck sitting spot on the corner of Front and N Street, close to my home. I didn't want to miss Candace Wiedler passing out the hot coffee and donuts, us truck sitters' first treat of the morning! The day was sunny and bright, with a cool wind, but when bending over, up and down, continuously picking up garbage, I would break a sweat. Between picking up in and around and crawling under the mining equipment, N Street, Sitnasuak's fenced area behind Nome Trading, the seawall east to the park and west to in front of Droke's home, I should have been eligible for about three bikes! Candace later brought me four Lions Club hot dogs, which I gobbled up, giving me more energy to keep going the rest of the afternoon. After all day, I could hardly stand straight, and didn't stick around for the goodies being passed out at 5 p.m. at Old St. Joe's. Perhaps if I spent more time at it, like sister Mary who takes on several miles of beach, Bypass Road and highways, I'd be in better shape. Home I headed, for a long hot shower, the couch, and the news. I had dozed off, and then my phone

One of the mineworkers was calling to let me know my cabin at Glacier Creek appeared to have been broken into. As they come and go to work at Rock Creek, they keep an eye on it, and now needed to tell me something looked very wrong. They said when they got off work Friday night after 6 p.m. and drove past, everything looked normal. On Saturday morning at 7a.m. when driving by headed to work, from the road, it looked like there were no windows left in the cabin. From the mine, they did not know how to find me, as I was not home. I was already on the run, preparing for my day of working hard for a community I care so much about.

I jolted awake, my head of hair still damp, my son Dawson at my side, and we jumped in the truck for the short drive to my cabin. As we approached more closely, we could see the curtains blowing freely out the gaping hole where windows once were. The door jam was busted; muddy footmarks smeared the door front, door busted off the hinges, and the hasp was busted in half. I found the padlock on the floor inside, still locked and attached to the hasp. Every window, seven of them, had been busted from either inside the cabin, or out, depending on which side of the wall the shattered glass lay. Cupboards were ripped off the wall, cupboard door fronts ripped away in the process. The oil stove and piping was separated and tipped over, sink base torn from the wall, propane stove damaged, chairs pushed through the window.

My eyes fell on a glass plate, originally nailed to the wall, now in a hundred pieces on the floor. My girlfriend Iris Foster had picked that plate up in Mexico some 10 or 15 years ago, bringing it as a gift to me several thousand miles distant, and the words in translation went something like "your house, my house." Destroyed. Bad news travels fast, and soon other cabin owners further up the Glacier Creek Road were heading out to check their properties. I called for help from the Alaska State Troopers.

The cabin has been around this country for a while. My sister Ginny and I purchased it in the late 1960s from Jess and Lou Maynard. For them, it had been their camp on the Nome River, for us it was to put a roof over our heads. Later, my oldest daughter Kelly slept there as a baby, while I was trying to get us a place to live. Then, my Dad loaded it on a barge to White Mountain so he and Al Doyle would have a place to sleep as they were working on the airport years ago. After it came back from that job, and in 1983, I got permission from the mining company to put the cabin on their property at Glacier Creek. There, in the willows, quite unnoticeable to the passer-by, I have raised five kids in all their camping glory, thousands of hot dogs later, millions of blueberries and salmon berries, over these almost 30 years. We would patiently wait every year for the snow to melt out of Anvil Creek and Snow Gulch, so we could get past the Kelliher's mining digs in the spring, and cross Glacier Creek. Being close to town, we could be at camp in 20 minutes.

Now, with the road changed so traffic barrels right over the top of us, and the continued removal of any greenery from the road's bottom edge, we are as exposed as a plucked duck. But in this country, what should that matter? Cabin and roadhouse locations are still identified and marked on maps. People should always know where they are, in case of emergency. I should never have had to put a lock on the door. And now, this.

I am thankful the mineworkers have been keeping watch on my cabin and particularly for the phone call from my classmate, Robbie O'Connor. His grandfather was proprietor of one of the last great roadhouses in the country, and he knows their importance, and that of a cabin in the country. I'm almost afraid to mention any names, for fear whomever has done this to me, will look for their cabin next. I am thankful to the Mike Winkleman family who came and helped me put the cabin back together as best we could, close up the window frames, and put the door back on, and for my sister Ginny Emmons and my friend Susan McClintock who helped pick up all the glass outside the cabin and cleaned inside the cabin. I am thankful my mother and father taught me some work ethic, including respect for other people's property.

While I lay sleeping Friday night, into Saturday morning, some slime ball was standing on my little deck kicking in the door to my cabin, smashing every piece of glass in it, ripping from the walls every cupboard and cabinet, dumping out the contents of dishes, paper and cleaning products, lamps, and busting up the oil and propane stoves.

While I was spending my day slipping and sliding and crawling on my hands and knees on the rocks picking up the trash of those who use the seawall as a garbage can, and the park as some place for their dog to crap, and trying to piece back together parts busted off old boilers and steam shovels and engines (as kids have turned that park into their arena for getting high on what appears to be the cocktail of choice. cough medicine), someone was reveling in the fact that just hours before, they had been in my cabin tearing it apart. I cannot imagine how a human being could conjure up this insensitive, inhuman, savage behavior, and carry it through.

What I can imagine, someone did not walk to Glacier Creek to do this. Someone was on a bicycle, a motorcycle, a four-wheeler, or in a car. Someone either knew this was my cabin, or they did not. Someone has no respect for other people's property, and this person represents the sickening underbelly scum of Nome. Where was your son, or daughter, or boyfriend, or husband, or girlfriend, or wife between the evening of Friday, June 4 at 6 p.m. and Saturday morning, June 5 at 7a.m.? Did you notice any unusual cuts, or glass particles shaking out of a hoodie, or socks, or jacket, as you did laundry or hung up the clothes?

This isn't just about my cabin. It is these same animals who bust the lettering out of our gold pan, crawl up on the heads of the Three Lucky Swedes, have smashed out the windows in Mrs. Mildred Straub's husband Elmer's Kougarok Freight and Mining cars and torn off the side rails, tied off ropes and tried to destroy the King Island boat frames I got donated for display, continue to bust up Swanberg's Dredge, painted graffiti on Old St. Joe's and other properties, ripped out the 40-some little spruce trees the Boy Scouts tried to transplant at the park which should have been about 5 feet tall by now, put bullet holes through every sign along the highways, busted every windshield, window, and headlight out of my father's old Beaterman, and anybody else's vehicles parked for future use. They break into our stores and businesses, trash the park and carve into the benches, rip down every hanging flower basket John Handeland ever bought, smash up the cement base around the bronze bust of Amundsen on Front Street, rip the flowers out of the dredge buckets when people try to beautify their property, and the list goes on and on. Who are the mothers of these beasts?

I've got the law on my side, and my ear to the ground, so keep looking over your shoulder, jerk. I am offering a reward to anyone who wants to spill the beans to myself, or wishes to contact Trooper Culley directly through the local office. Parents, wake up.

Thank you for your time. When the dust settles, we will still be enjoying a good hot dog over the fire, regardless of the damage that has been done. The town looks great after clean up, and I wish everyone a wonderful summer. We need it.

health coverage this year. The governor's answer: abortion. In his press conference he stated that it came to his attention that funds from this program could be used for abortions; something that was not discovered during the legislature's deliberative process. While I appreciate that the Governor has a pro-life position and wants to stand by that, I disagree with this particular line of logic. Denying the increase does nothing to resolve his underlying concern. The Alaska Supreme Court has ruled that these funds cannot be restricted from use in this procedure. He is not removing the program, he is only reducing the number of households eligible for the program. In my opinion, making a nominal reduction in something you oppose at the cost of a drastic increase in something you support does not make sense. These funds would help hundreds of Alaskan families to remain just that: families.

will be strengthened. And if laws were broken, those responsible will be brought to justice.

These are hard times in Louisiana and across the Gulf Coast, an area that has already seen more than its fair share of troubles. The people of this region have met this terrible catastrophe with seemingly boundless strength and character in defense of their way of life. What we owe them is a commitment by our nation to match the resilience they have shown. That is our mission. And it is one we will fulfill.

Budget funds planning for road to Nome, state building

By Diana Haecker

The waiting game last Thursday was over to find out which capital projects and which operating budget items for fiscal year 2011 survived Gov. Sean Parnell's red veto pen.

Parnell signed into law the appropriations bills, House Bill 300 to establish the FY 2011 operating budget and Senate Bill 230, the FY 2011 capital budget.

The Legislature handed Parnell a $3.2 billion budget package that he trimmed down by $336 million through line-item vetoes. Parnell said he funded constitutionally established priorities such as resource development, education, public safety and infrastructure. Citing the unpredictability of the oil market-Alaska's general funds are generated through oil and gas taxes—he said now is the time to save for the future. "Because Alaska is so dependent on volatile oil revenues, it makes sense to look ahead 10 years and save for the day when we again are likely to have a sizeable deficit," Parnell said in a prepared statement. "A more sustainable level of spending allows us to save more now so we can meet our constitutional obligations in the future."

All vetoed line items were prefaced by this explanation: "Reduce spending level—consider in future budget." Parnell said he had met with all 60 legislators to go over their district's requests. He said the cuts came to projects that will be proposed again in future budgets.

The biggest outrage in reaction to Parnell's budget came when his red pen erased hopes for the Denali KidCare expansion. The bill Parnell vetoed, SB 13, would have increased the qualifying income eligibility standard to 200 percent of the federal poverty line, up from 175 percent. Parnell's veto not only cost the program nearly $3 million, but also diminished the chance to get $2 million in matching federal money. Parnell cut $2.9 million from the operating budget that would have added 1,300 more children and 218 more pregnant women to the program. Denali KidCare covers currently 7.900 Alaska children. Parnell justified the axing of the program's expansion as he "opposes expanding eligibility and funding for publicly funded abortions.'

The Associated Press reports that $384,000 of the program's $217 million budget last year went toward abortion-related services and 664 people received such services. However, Denali KidCare only pays for abortions if a physician finds it to be medically necessary.

As for the capital budget, Parnell funded big line-item tickets such as $20 million for the Port of Anchorage, $40 million for the Tanana River Bridge and $35 million for the Port MacKenzie Rail Extension, citing job creation and economic growth. Both the in-state and the large-diameter gas line projects are funded to bring gas to Alaskans and to markets in the Lower 48.

Resource development playing big on the governor's agenda, the budget includes funding for accessing resources in the Foothills region, the Ambler mining district and to Western Alaska. Parnell gave the thumbs up to $4 million for the planning, design and engineering of a road to the Ambler mining district. The Western Access Project—a.k.a. the Road to Nome—received $1 million for planning under a former Gov. Frank Murkowski legacy program called "Roads to Resources."

In addition to having the Department of Justice beefed up with lawyers to fight Endangered Species Act listings that could hamper resource development, the budget also includes $600,000 for Alaska Fish and Game research on ESA listings.

Parnell slashed statewide Alaska Energy Authority renewable energy round three grant funding in half from more than $50 million to $25 million. For the Bering Straits, three projects were listed to qualify for round three funds. Those were Pilgrim Hot Springs geothermal resource assessment, the final design.

permitting and construction of a Teller wind farm and a wind feasibility analysis for Stebbins. It is yet unclear how the governor's funding cut will impact these projects as AEA has a July 1 deadline to approve projects for funding.

The total of funded projects for House District 39, including the Bering Strait region and Nome, came to $75,570 million. Parnell redlined the Nome Rec Center remodel ($500,000), vetoed the Nome Courthouse deferred maintenance and remodel ($2.7 million), and scrapped the Unalakleet regional assisted living facility ($300,00). He reduced the construction and development of a new Nome Museum from $5 million to $2 million.

Here is what is funded: Nome airport master plan ($100,000), Nome-Council highway mile 4 to 16 improvements ($7 million), Golovin airport runway improvements ($12 million), Nome-Beltz generator switching replacement ($34,000), fire alarm system replacement and roof replacements for two buildings. Also funded is a new state office building with $2 million; a new tractor and steel garage for Savoonga, and heavy equipment for Shaktoolik and Teller. Also $1.7 million is appropriated for erosion control in Unalakleet, $857,000 for a new public safety building in White Mountain and $100,000 for Village Public Safety Officer housing in Elim.

lives outside the city limits and cannot vote with Nomeites, was against it.

Besides, "I can't vote for the people who are going to decide," she said. "It would seem like classic taxation without representation."

It seemed to Miller, she said, that the people attending from outside the city were against annexation. "Will you say something about

"Will you say something about how people who don't want it can address the Local Boundary Commission?" she asked. "This is a part of the comprehensive plan process," Nome Planning Commissioner Jeff Darling said. "This is a part of the conversation to see if there is a want or a need for annexation."

Representatives from the Local Boundary Commission and Nome Planning Commission emphasized and underlined that no petition or action was in progress for annexation, that planners were just offering information and trying to see which way the wind blew on the issue.

In pasting their ideas on the boards, many saluted Nome's strengths as a community: proximity to wilderness recreation, good schools, feeling of community, an absence of chain stores, a diversity of cultures, strong art support, and a City Carrie M. McLain Museum for all people and cultures, just as samples.

On the downside, alcohol was a recurring thread, with quite a few yellow notes calling for solutions including a treatment center. Downtown ugliness was cited by several along with a large number of pieces of mining equipment left for new landowners to deal with along with old military remnants. Add to these junk vehicles, construction equipment left to rust after jobs, absence of fish for subsistence, dominance of bars in downtown Nome, limited health care and the high cost of living.

Notably, respondents named absence of a Wal-Mart store as both a weakness and a strength in Nome.

Nome has many opportunities, as listed at that input station: promoting local food, using waste heat from NJUS generators for a community greenhouse, making way for green space, keeping subsistence resources close to town, for example.

Finally, Charles Trainer offered an innovative idea to get buildings back from the existing seawall and water damage, coupled with a solution to the shortage of parking downtown: build a second seawall parallel and outside the existing seawall with street lights and parking spaces. Regular breaks in the existing seawall with stairways up and over would provide Front Street foot traffic access to shops along the promenade.

State office site remains unsettled

By Sandra L. Medearis

State agencies and local businesses with a stake in the location of the new state building met with Nome Common Council last week to put their best feet forward on getting the building placed where it would generate benefits for those concerned.

The meeting centered on a visit from state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities Commissioner Leo von Scheben who came to have a "face-to-face" with community leaders on the location of the proposed $40 million project, an issue of controversy currently over keeping the state offices on Front Street or moving them north of town on the old Alaska Gold Co. site at the end of Steadman Street.

"I'm getting some mixed signals I'd like to get straightened out," von Scheben said.

Scheben said.

The commissioner got some straight information in the session all right—that the signals are indeed mixed.

He would like to get it all sorted out, he said, because he wants to build a building for state workers, he said. The need became clear to him during a fact-finding visit to Nome in 2007 when he visited workers in the current storm damaged, old, shabby building

City budget takes shape

By Laurie McNicholas

The City of Nome's proposed general fund budget for FY2011 includes $140,000 for staffing and startup costs for the bowling alley at the Nome Recreation Center, $84,000 to buy two new patrol vehicles for the police department, $250,000 to buy a D-6 dozer for use at the landfill, and $185,000 to buy a new dump truck with a 15-yard box for the Public Works Department. Those items were among major budget requests discussed by the Nome Common Council during a work session on June 11.

Among smaller funding requests favored by council members are $15,000 to help the Nome Sportsman's Association upgrade the Sunset Firing Range and $36,000 to compensate volunteers for the fire and ambulance departments for the cost of keeping their personal vehicles plugged into electrical outlets in winter months. The compensation figure is based on paying 60 volunteers $100 per month for six months.

School board OKs Gast as new principal

By Tyler Rhodes

By a 2-1 vote, the thinned-down Nome Board of Education approved the hire June 8 of Steve Gast as the new principal for Nome-Beltz Junior/Senior High School next year.

On the Web:

www.nomenugget.net E-mail:

nugget@nomenugget.com

Gast, who has spent the majority of his career in Texas, had the recommendation of Superintendent Jon Wehde and unanimous approval from a hiring committee following a public interview at the high school June 2. At the June 8 board meeting, Board President Gloria Karmun and member Kirsten Timbers followed suit and gave their support to Gast while member Barb Nickels voted no. "While I'd like to think I could stand by [Wehde's] current recommendation, I think I am going to have to stand by his prior recommendation," Nickels said before her vote.

The prior recommendation to which Nickels referred was for Janeen Sullivan, the principal who just finished the school year and—despite Wehde's recommendation—was denied a new contract by the board in January. That decision set forth a series of events that ultimately resulted in the fact that only three board members were seated at the table June 8. The final results of a recall election for all five board members were certified the previous day, leaving ousted board members Albert McComas and Heather Payenna observing the June 8 meeting from the audience.

The June 8 meeting showed that settling of the drawn out recall vote did little to settle tensions both within the board itself or between segments of the community and board members. The issue of the denied contracts for Sullivan and assistant principal Doug Boyer has surfaced at every meeting since the board's Jan. 12 vote to replace the two high school administrators.

The inclusion of Gast's potential hire on the agenda only ensured that divisive discussion would continue. "I would wager this is the hot-button issue of the evening," Wehde said, prefacing his recommendation for the new administrator. But Wehde didn't really need to point it out; the interest in the agenda item was already evident at the beginning of the meeting.

One of the released administrators was among the first to speak during the meeting's public comment period. "You have the principal's position on agenda. I would like you to take into consideration Mr. Wehde's recommendation of Jan. 12," Boyer said. "The majority of the board that is here now supported Mrs. Sullivan's contract."

Both Karmun and Nickels voted Jan. 12 to renew the administrators' contracts, but were outvoted by Timbers, Payenna and McComas. While Karmun did originally vote to retain both administrators, she has firmly maintained that the board democratically and fairly arrived at the majority decision. Ever since the Jan. 12 meeting Karmun had stood with the rest of the board in refusing to revisit the issue, despite Nickels' repeated attempts to put the issue up to another vote, one way or another.

The June 8 meeting was no different as Nickels again put a motion on the table to add a discussion of Boyer's contract to the agenda for the meeting. She received no second,

Child's Play in Rural Alaska

By Ben Howard Unalakleet, AK

During last football season, I often saw commercials sponsored by the NFL encouraging children to play at least 60 minutes a day. The commercials showed NFL players with kids in parks and playgrounds playing games, running around, and generally having a good time, all set to pumped-up background music. Apparently, the campaign, "Movement For An Active Generation", is an effort to get kids off their couches and exercise through play. It coincides with the other national initiatives to battle childhood obesity. It endeavors to remind parents and society as a whole, to put down their children's Cheetos and Wii remotes and get outside to play with their friends. Ride bikes, play kickball, camouflage in Hide and Go Seek, engage in epic water wars or fight bad guys as the latest superhero. Overall, not bad reminders.

The big question is, "Why the re-

Why do we need to remind kids to play? It seems so simple on the surface, considering our collective experiences as children ourselves long ago, yet it's perhaps a bit more complicated when you have time to observe and reflect on it. Am I willing to let my kid go to the playground by himself? If not, then my child's playtime is now subject to my schedule. Do I take him to the playground or finish the report on my desk due tomorrow? This is a classic dilemma faced by countless generations of working parents. If on the other hand, I do allow my child to go to the playground by himself, the worry soon sinks in. CNN flashes before my mind and I see Nancy Grace reporting on another missing child... and it's mine. No way in hell is my kid going to the playground by himself. "Dad, can I play Lord of The Rings on PlayStation?" "Of course. I need to finish my report that's due tomorrow. We'll go to the playground on Tuesday." As I sit down to begin writing my report, an unnoticed Lynyrd Skynard serenades, 'Tuesday's Gone With The Wind."

"Honey, don't forget that Johnny has football practice at 4:30 p.m. today. Can you take him?" What about organized sports and activities? Gets kids off the couch. Check. Great exercise. Check. Learn something new. Check. Probably meets the mission of the NFL's campaign, but is it really play? I would argue that by simply having as many adults involved in an activity as there are kids, the answer is no. Adults mean rules. Rules for behavior, time management, conflict resolution, and making sure everyone gets a turn. All valuable lessons in the context of the activity, but foreign in its form of genuine play. In the realm of this type of play, kids take care of the rules. Somehow they figure it out. They know when someone isn't being treated fairly. They know the rules, how to follow them, and the consequences of not adhering to them. Bullies are eventually dealt with, cheaters admonished, and the self-centered ignored. A fate worse than any of Dante's circles is not being asked to go play. The kid walking about by himsel for not being asked to play, probably falls into one of these categories and more often than not, it follows them into adulthood.

There is something truly wondrous about a gang of unsupervised kids playing. Leave in the morning, check in at lunch for a PB & J, head out again, and finally plead for 10 more minutes when called to come home in the evening. Rare are these days for sure in most parts of the country.

I wrote this commentary for two reasons. The first and most important reason is from a moment of clarity. I took my middle son to the local health clinic to have a stitch removed from his head. As he sat on the examination table, dangling his feet off the side, I had a fleeting chance to simply look at him. He was literally the walking wounded. Banged up, but happy. His shoes were shabby, one zipper broken, knees scuffed with remnants of glue from old band-aids, a bruised lip, a single stitch in his head, and best of all dirty. Each wound had a story. I asked what happened and he simply said he got hurt playing. What a

The second reason is a nod to the community I live in, Unalakleet, AK. I recall reading an article a couple of months ago about a man who lay dying by a storefront in New York City. After being stabbed in an attempt to interrupt a mugging, he fell mortally wounded. Video surveillance showed multiple people simply walk by as he died. No help or concern. The connection with my story is my son's single stitch. When he fell playing and injured his head, my wife and I were out of town. A community member saw him by the street, holding his bleeding head, took him to the clinic, calmed him when the health aide began the work of cleaning and stitching his wound, and then took him home to our babysitter. He called us and assured us our son was fine and didn't even cry through the entire experience. No big deal. That's how it is in Unalakleet. Kids play. Kids are safe. Nancy Grace won't be visiting soon.

Dirty Trick

Governor Sean Parnell in an attempt to exercise his newly discovered personal conviction against Denali Kid Care threw the baby out with the bathwater. He vetoed increased funding for Denali Kid Care and 1,300 Alaska children are without medical care, and 218 pregnant women are ineligible for health care coverage.

He must be proud of himself for cutting off our nose to spite our face. Is this so he can turn up his nose to matching federal money? It makes one wonder why he has become so extremely righteous. This is the same Denali Kid Care he supported years ago. Medically necessary abortions have always been funded and Parnell must have known this to be true.

Are there enough legislators to call a special session to override Parnell's veto? Probably not. What is apparent to most Alaskans is that Parnell is proud of following the fiscally conservative branch of his party and refusing to accept federal money. Hey! Kids can't vote. They won't cry foul, but their parents and caring adults can vote. Parnell's running for re-election. Ooops! He was appointed, wasn't he?

Ulmer appointed to Gulf oil spill commission

President Barack Obama on Monday appointed Fran Ulmer, former Alaska Lt. Governor and current UAA Chancellor, to the five-member national commission on the BP Deepwater Horizon oil spill and offshore drilling. The commission was established by executive order on May 22 and its mission is to examine the relevant facts and circumstances concerning the root causes of the Deepwater Horizon oil disaster and to develop options to guard against the impact of oil spills associated with offshore drilling. The commission is to submit a final public report to the President with its findings and options for consideration within six months of the date of the Commission's first meeting.

No special session to override Parnell's SB 13 veto

When Governor Sean Parnell struck funding for the expansion of the Denali Kid Care program, Senators who supported the bill to create the expansion were outraged and called for a special session. However, a Senate poll last week showed that only eleven Senators supported calling a special session.

Forty members of the Alaska legislature are needed to make this happen. Anchorage Democrat Hollis French, also running for governor in this fall's election, said the issue is not dead and vowed to tackle the issue again in the next session. Parnell had supported SB13 all along, but last week asserted that he didn't know that the Denali Kid Care program used state money to pay for abortions.

Nome Senator Donny Olson said that Parnell's rejection came as a surprise since the governor had pledged his support throughout the legislative process. Olson said in his newsletter that he does not condone abortions either, but that "Medicaid funding has always covered medically necessary procedures related to abortion, and this bill would not have done anything to change that one way or the other." The Nome Senator also expects that the matter will be before legislators again.

Polar bear subsistence quota established

After 20 years, negotiations between Russia and the U.S. came to an end with the agreement to establish a Native subsistence quota for the Chukchi Sea polar bear population. Alaska Public Radio reports that at a meeting in Anchorage last week, a commission set the quota at 58 bears for both countries.

The commission was established with a bilateral treaty that is designed to conserve the population of bears who live on both sides of the border. The quota of the allowable take of 19 females and 39 males struck a compromise between the scientific working group, who wanted less polar bears taken, and Native hunters who wanted a larger allowable harvest. The quota does not affect Barrow or Wainright hunters, as they take from the Beaufort Sea polar bear population.

AG questions ANWR review process

Attorney General Dan Sullivan has called on the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to issue a new notice of intent for its review of a comprehensive conservation plan for the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. Sullivan questioned whether the current notice impermissibly excludes public comments on the prospect of oil and gas development on the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge coastal plain.

Fish and wildlife gave notice that it asks the public how they view the desired future conditions of the refuge and to define ANWR's full range of purposes. The notice also stated that it would not consider comments related to oil and gas development in ANWR, highlighting the fact that only Congress can open the coastal plain to oil and gas development. Because that is the crux of the matter – for both opponents and proponents of oil drilling in ANWR -AG Sullivan suggested that the notice violates the service's duties under the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act and the National Environmental Policy Act because the agency is expressly required by these statutes to evaluate the impacts of oil and gas exploration in ANWR. Not to allow public comments on matters related to oil and gas development in ANWR likely violates NEPA, Sullivan said.

Murkowski looses fight to limit EPA's reach

In a final showdown on June 10,

Alaska Senator Lisa Murkowski's disapproval resolution regarding the Environmental Protection Agency's regulation of stationary greenhouse gas emitters failed on the Senate floor. The vote was along party lines with all Republican Senators plus six Democrats voting for her disapproval resolution. The measure failed 47 to 53.

Murkowski said that her disapproval resolution was about protecting the whole economy from EPA regulation and ensuring that elected representatives in Congress are the ones developing energy and environmental policies for the nation, not unelected bureaucrats. She was supported by Gov. Sean Parnell and the companies involved in development of Alaska's natural resources, Anchorage Mayor Dan Sullivan, Alaska Chamber of Commerce, Denali Project and ConocoPhillips Alaska, Alaska Pipeline Project, Pacific Seafood Processors, Alaska Miners Association, CalPortland Cement, Usibelli Mine and the Alaska Native Corps. NANA and ASRC.

Murkowski said the disapproval resolution would have avoided the coming "economic train wreck" EPA regulation of greenhouse gases is expected to cause. In Alaska, former commissioner of commerce and economic development Larry Merculieff and Pat Lavin, Alaska Director of Clean Energy Works, criticized Murkowski for delaying comprehensive energy legislation.

New housing construction for Nome's National Weather Service

The National Weather Service is about to award an almost $2 million construction contract to build new housing for National Weather Service families in Nome with federal stimulus money. The plan is to replace the 40plus year old current NWS housing in Nome, because it is not meeting modern housing standards. The construction project is scheduled to begin in the summer of 2010 and be completed no later than the summer of 2011. The contract comes on top of more than $150 million in Recovery Act funds delivered to Nome to date, said US Senator Mark Begich. Construction is already underway on the Norton Sound Regional Hospital. Other funding has supported the Nome School District, energy efficiency upgrades and tribal housing.

ilaq. A full list of funded projects was sent to all the cities and boroughs within the districts; if you did not receive that information, please contact our office. Thanks to all of you for your hard work in your communities and in communicating with Governor Parnell about the importance of these necessary projects.

SB 13 Expansion of Denali Kid

This bill became very controversial when Governor Parnell vetoed the additional funding and then the bill. The bill would have expanded coverage from 175 percent of the federal poverty level to 200 percent of the federal poverty level for those pregnant women and children who are otherwise eligible for Medicaid through the Denali Kid Care program. It came as a surprise since the governor has been a supporter of this program from its inception in Alaska, and he pledged his support throughout the legislative process. The governor stated his reason for the veto is that he only recently discovered that Medicaid funding covers medically necessary abortions, and he does not support that. Likewise, I do not condone abortions either. Medicaid funding has always covered medically necessary procedures related to abortion, and this bill would not have done anything to change that one way or the other. A medically necessary procedure can be anything from counseling to taking a sonogram to an actual abortion. Elective abortions are not covered by Medicaid. The courts have already ruled that if funding for medically necessary treatments to low-income residents is given, then the providers cannot exclude medically necessary treatments for abortion. Many people feel the Governor reneged on his promise and support. But more importantly, regardless of a person's position on abortion, there are nearly 2,000 Alaskan pregnant women and children who will not be covered under Medicaid as a result of his veto. In spite of this, there does not seem to be the support in the legislature to call ourselves into special session in order to override this veto. Expect to hear more about this next session. ICC General Assembly

My wife, Willow, and I will be among many who will be traveling to Nuuk, Greenland as Alaskan delegates for the Inuit Circumpolar Council (ICC) General Assembly Conference from June 28 to July 2, 2010. Inuit from Arctic regions Chukotka, Alaska, Canada and Greenland gather for a conference every four years. The is the international organization representing approximately 160,000 Inuit living in the Arctic regions listed above.

The principal goals of are to strengthen unity among Inuit of the circumpolar region as well as to promote Inuit rights and interests on the international level. ICC works to ensure and further develop Inuit culture and society for both the present and future generations. The organization also seeks full and active participation in the political, economic, and social development in our native homelands. It hopes to develop and encourage long-term policies, which safeguard the Arctic environment. ICC also advocates international recognition of the human rights of all Indigenous Peoples

My staff and I are happy to welcome some new staff on board. Laura Lawrence began working in the Nome office in May. She was born in Nome and grew up in Unalakleet. sary as sentence five covers both items. What's important about this initiative is that it increases the number of districts. This helps mitigate the expanding geographical size of rural districts which would otherwise be inevitable with redistricting. It will not change rural to urban representation, because urban areas will enjoy the same benefit. Right now, each of the 40 House Districts is made up of roughly 15,000 residents. That's based on the population during the last redistricting plan when Alaska had about 600,000 people. Estimates of the population today center around 700,000 (though they could be higher or lower). Without this increase in the number of voting districts we would change to 17,500 residents per district. That would be the equivalent of adding about five villages the size of Scammon Bay (Pop. 534 as of 2008) to each House District. How can candidates afford to travel to each village and get to know its people and its issues? How can they balance the needs of one village against another? Rural districts are already spread thin. I'm afraid that without this ballot initiative we could be stretched to the breaking point. It is important for us to unify around this point. This is not about the legislators who leave their home for Juneau every session. It is about the people they represent.

HCR 22 the Northern Waters Task Force

This bill is also awaiting transmittal to the governor, but I believe it is more crucial than ever. With the increased interest in fishing, shipping and development in the northern waters (US and International) it is important that Alaska establish its seat at the policy table. As one of the United States we are subject to national laws and regulations. Anything three or more miles offshore is federal and not state waters. So while Alaska is the only state that will feel the real world effects of these laws and regulations, and is the one and only state giving the USA Northern Waters status, we do not necessarily have appropriate input into the process. The impetus of this task force is to work with local and state interests to establish key goals, concerns, and opportunities; and to have significant input on the best structure for a federal body to address these issues. This task force would then work with the legislature, the governor, and the federal government in developing just such an organization. The events in the Gulf of Mexico highlight Alaska's need to have a say in policies affecting our adjacent waters and coastline. In the case of OCS drilling it is a double edged sword. The events in the Gulf call attention to the safety concerns of off shore drilling. It is essential that recent events do not replicate themselves in our state. That being said, there are those outside our state who would draw erroneous similarities in an effort to shut down all oil and gas development. An important difference between the Gulf and Alaska OCS is the depth at which the rigs are working. In the Gulf, the break in the pipe is 5,000 ft below sea level. In Alaska we will be drilling in less than 100 ft of water. What has caused the complications in the Gulf is the inability of remote control submersibles to act effectively. At the shallow depth Alaska operators would be dealing with, divers would be able to go down and physically asses and deal with the problem. In the case of OCS, Alaska has two things to protect, its environment, and its right to responsible development.

Slow start to commercial herring fishery, but 13% roe fetches high price

By Laurie McNicholas

The Norton Sound herring sac roe fishery began slowly last week, with ice around Cape Denbigh and Shaktoolik preventing fishing in that area.

However, by Monday 12 fishermen had harvested 150 tons of herring with 13 percent roe near St. Michel, reports Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. The target harvest for the fishery is 1,000 tons.

A herring catch comprised of 13 percent ripe eggs by weight fetches $260 per ton, the high end of the price range set by the Norton Sound Economic Development board in April. Icicle Seafoods sent the processor RM Thorstenson and four tenders to Norton Sound for the herring fishery under an agreement with NSEDC.

"The fishing usually occurs to the north at Cape Denbigh or south at Tolstoi and Saint Michael where more herring come in to spawn," Menard noted. He said some fishers from northern Norton Sound villages have made their way through icy waters to join the herring harvest near St. Michael. "The ice has been moving offshore and coming back, so they are able to get out at times," he explained. "Also the tender helps the boats to get out."

On June 11 only two Norton Sound fishermen were harvesting herring due to ice conditions, and Menard was worried because the tenders are scheduled to leave for Bristol Bay late this week.

Waiting in the wings is the Norton Sound commercial red king crab fishery with a harvest quota of 400,000 pounds this year, an increase of 25,000 pounds over the 2009 quota. An openbeen determined. The ADF&G man-ing date for the fishery has not yet agement plan for the 2010 commercial www.cf.adfg.state.ak.us. Click on

NSEDC dissolves education foundation

By Laurie McNicholas

The board of directors of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. decided to dissolve the NSEDC Education Foundation at a special meeting June 4 in Anchorage. Barb Nickels has served since June of 2009 as executive director and president of the foundation in Nome.

"The NSEDC board really struggled with this issue," said NSEDC president and board chairman Dan Harrelson in a press release issued last week. "The foundation was created as the result of years of discussion and planning by the NSEDC board, but after careful consideration, the board determined that the future of NSEDC's scholarship program is best left in the hands of the parent company. The board sincerely appreciates all the efforts made by the NSEDC Education Foundation board and staff."

"The NSEDC board created the foundation in 2009 as a means of establishing a perpetual scholarship fund for the residents of Norton Sound," continues the press release. "NSEDC planned to endow $15 million to the education foundation after it was recognized by the IRS as having tax-exempt status."

The board determined that the future of NSEDC's scholarship program can be protected through internal financial controls and development of the company's existing Education, Employment, and Training Department, the release states.

In e-mail responses to questions from the Nugget, Harrelson said the $15 million with which NSEDC planned to endow the education foundation would have included the balance of the company's education endowment fund, plus any additional funds needed to reach the total. "That $15 million fund was intended to provide a long-term source of funding for the foundation," he added. NSEDC established the education endowment fund as an investment account in 1993.

Harrelson said the dissolution of the foundation will not in any way affect the administration of NSEDC's established scholarship program, and all students who were awarded scholarships this spring will receive timely payment of their $2,000 NSEDC scholarship. "It should also be noted that the application process for NSEDC scholarships will remain the same and continue without interruption," he added.

"The total amount of money in the education endowment fund as of May 31, 2010 was approximately $9.4 million," Harrelson noted. "NSEDC intends for this fund to remain dedicated to funding its educational projects and programs. In 2009, NSEDC awarded just over $606,000 in scholarships to students seeking post-secondary or vocational education. Also in 2009, NSEDC provided over $93,000 in funding for other educational and training programs in the region. Jerry Ivanoff will continue to oversee the NSEDC Education, Employment and Training Department."

Harrelson said the education endowment fund had a balance of $10.4 million at the end of 2007, $7.8 million at the end of 2008, and $9.3 million at the end of 2009. "All changes in value reflect market fluctuations, as NSEDC has not made contributions or withdrawals to the education endowment fund in a number of years," he added.

Origin of the foundation

During a meeting in Nome on Nov. 1, 2007, the NSEDC board unanimously approved a motion by Unalakleet representative Paul Johnson to set up a foundation to protect the company's education endowment fund. It was stated that the fund totaled $10.6 million.

Johnson said he was leaving the board and wanted to be a party to preserving the company' education funds. He said NSEDC had no mechanism to protect the funds from a lawsuit. Nome's board member Don Stiles said the company needed to endow the foundation with funds for scholarships and training so that the principle can never be touched.

Eugene Asicksik, who was then NSEDC's chief executive officer, noted that the company had not added any funds to the endowment for five years. The company's original Community Development Quota plan was to establish an endowment and contribute revenues until the fund reached $5 million, he explained. He said profits from the investment of endowment funds provided money for scholarships and training.

As one of six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program established under the Magnuson-Stevens Act, NSEDC represents 15 member communities in the Bering Strait region. A portion of the annual total allowable catches of certain groundfish and crab species in the Bering Sea/Aleutian Islands is allocated to the CDQ Program to promote sustainable economic development in western Alaska.

The first meeting of the NSEDC

Education Foundation board of directors took place in January 2009 in Nome. The directors are Victor Joe, chairman, Wilfred Katcheak, Stebbins; Laura Degnan Lawrence, Nome; Eric Morris, White Mountain, and Janice Dickens, Unalakleet. Joe and Katcheak are also members of the NSEDC board.

Harrelson said Nickels is the foundation's only employee, and she is employed directly by the foundation board, not NSEDC. "Based on communication with the foundation board, it is NSEDC's understanding that Ms. Nickels will be assisting with the dissolution process, which is expected to be completed by the end of June," he added. "Once this process is concluded, the foundation will no longer exist and employment of an executive director will not be necessary."

When contacted by the Nugget, Nickels referred all inquiries about the decision to dissolve the NSEDC Education Foundation to Harrelson.

demonstrate the city's appreciation to the volunteers.

At a regular meeting on Monday the council heard the first reading of an ordinance to approve and adopt the FY2011 general fund budget and scheduled it for a pubic hearing and final action on June 28. The budget projects a total $10.8 million in revenues, $9.1 million of which is obtainable from resources other than a municipal property tax.

The ordinance identifies the total assessment valuation of all taxable property within the city as $241.1 million and levies 7 mills on taxable real and personal property within the city. The 7 mill rate will raise $1.7 million in revenues for the FY2011 budget, and the city's 5 percent general sales tax collections are expected to produce revenues of $4.6 million.

The council also heard first readings of ordinances to approve four other FY2011 City of Nome budgets—the capital project fund budget for $3.4 million, the special revenue fund budget for $196,151, the Port of Nome budget for $1.3 million, and the construction capital funds budget for $2.9 million. The council will hold a public hearing and take final action on the budgets June 28.

The council approved an ordinance to revise Chapter 11.50 of the Nome Code of Ordinances as required by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. The definition of "development" in Section 11.50.060 is amended to read: "Development means any man-made change to improved or unimproved real estate, including but not limited to buildings or other structures, mining, dredging, filling, grading, paving, excavation or drilling operation or storage equipment or materials located within the area of the flood hazard." Section 5.10.050(b) is amended to read: "A floodplain development permit is required for any development in an area of special flood hazard as defined in Section 11.50.060." No testimony was given at a public hearing preceding the council's action.

Council adopts resolutions

The council unanimously took the following actions by resolution:

• Approved a risk management plan for the City of Nome by adopting the Alaska Municipal League Joint Insurance Association's Safety Incentive Plan for FY11. The city is insured by and a member of AMLJIA.

- Approved a one-year contract with Wendy Chamberlain of Legislative Consultants in Alaska for state lobbying services for FY 2011 in the amount of $75,000.
- Approved an agreement for professional planning services with Eileen Bechtol of Bechtol Planning and Development from July 1, 2010 through June 30, 2011 for a total cost not to exceed $20,000.
- Approved an agreement with Amy Smithhisler to continue contractual services as the animal control officer for the City of Nome. Compensation for services under the agreement includes payment of $3,300 per month.
- Approved a City of Nome mill rate of 7 mills for 2010. Alaska Statute 29.45.240 requires that a municipality shall annually determine by resolution the rate of levy by June 15 of the tax year. The mill rate will be used to determine revenues in the FY2011 budgets.
- Authorized City Manager Josie Bahnke to enter into an agreement with Colby Carter for professional services to assist with maintenance and operations of the City of Nome's emergency communications equipment at a rate of $75 per hour.

The council approved a fee waiver request for use of the Nome Recreation Center for a celebration of life held May 28 for Lloyd Hardy.

City manager's report

Bahnke drew attention to a report from Police Chief John Papasodora in which he described 50 hours of training provided to members of the Nome Police Department in the past 2 1/2 months.

Papasodora reported that all officers received six hours of training and review in relevant Alaska case law in search and seizure, four officers took four hours of instruction in alcohol influence recognition and standardized field sobriety testing, and all members participated in two hours of orientation to the department's new operations and procedures manual and 18 hours of firearms training and orientation.

Papasodora said he served as primary instructor for the training, which was conducted with little or no overtime involved.

Mayor Denise Michels and all council members attended the meeting.

Two-year wireless plan required. Some restrictions apply.

As a young man his elders taught him how to hunt seals, oogruks, walruses and whales, catch birds, make tools, build and repair skin boats, carve ivory, and the generations of knowledge of what it takes to be a successful provider on Diomede.

David was very humble about his years spent in service to his country as a member of the Alaska National Guard for over 20 years, and he was buried with military honors. David married Dorothy Elasanga, and for ten years lived in Seattle where he became a master carver of soapstone and ivory, and supported his family

But his beloved island called him home where he resumed producing some of Diomede's finest ivory bracelets and carvings. He purchased a Wales-style skin boat and modified it into a stable ocean-going Diomede boat. And just as he had learned Diomede's traditional ways from his elders, David patiently taught his son, David Jr., and his many beloved nephews the skills of hunting, and helped guide them into manhood. Even in his later years he continued to teach Diomede's children as an elder in the classroom.

David also skillfully maintained and operated heavy equipment for the City of Diomede from February 1991 to January 2004. He had a tremendous work ethic and would donate additional hours of his time to make sure the planes and passengers could make it safely in and out of Diomede.

But more than any of his accomplishments, David was most loved for his quick and sincere smile, his easy laugh, his kindness to all, and his ready willingness to help anyone in need. He was a man immediately liked by everyone who met him, and deeply loved by all who knew him especially his son and the nephews and nieces he helped raise. He will be greatly missed.

David was preceded in death by is parents his siblings Robert Soolook Sr., Frances Soolook, Sam Soolook and Michael Soolook Sr., his wife Dorothy Elasanga, his aunt and uncle Paul and Theresa Soolook, and his grandson Sean Lee Kiminock. He is survived by his sister-in-law Alice Soolook, his son David, Jr., his grandchildren Brandon Immanuel Soolook, Theresa Elizabeth Soolook, Bernice Penayah, Elizabeth Ersten Val Soolook, Dean Rex Micheal, Lucy Tiffany Soolook, Frank Allen Soolook, and innumerable nieces, nephews and their children. He will also be dearly missed by everyone fortunate enough to have called David their friend.

Ung-uup-chuk Frances Kokochuruk (Matthews) Johnson April 23, 1910 to May 29, 2010

On the date and time appointed by our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, Mother left her earthly home on Saturday, May 29, 2010 at approximately 8:20 a.m. to join her Heavenly Father.

Mother was born at Cape Darby on the shores of Golovin Bay. Because her exact date of birth was not recorded, she was officially assigned April 23, 1910 as her date of birth. She was the fifth child born to Eunice and Matthew Kokochuruk.

As a toddler, she was stricken with polio. Her earliest memories were watching other youngsters running and playing; and of wishing she could join them. She went on to overcome this and many of life's other catastrophic illnesses, including tuberculosis, hypothyroidism, diabetes, cancer, and cardiac arrest. Having survived her bout with cancer, she became a speaker on two videos for Alaska Native and American Indian women-Breast Cancer Awareness and Stories of My Sisters—to encourage and support other women to seek early treatment for breast cancer.

She was raised in a traditional subsistence lifestyle. She harvested and learned to preserve all the subsistence resources in her region; and willingly shared this knowledge with her children, her grandchildren, and anyone wanting to learn.

She grew up doing "man's work"-driving dog teams, hunting game animals, seining for fish, working in the local saltry, and trapping fur-bearing animals-which she later tanned for use in garment making. Her father told her "I see that women can work as good as men" for she helped provide for her family from her earnings gilling, packing, and salting herring.

She was an accomplished seamstress-whether her medium was skins, fabric, yarn, beads or threads - who learned the skills from her mother, Eunice. During her lifetime, she fashioned seven traditional fur dress parkas-two of which went on to win awards in Anchorage, Alaska. Her hands were never idle.

She was a storyteller of many Inupiat legends, stories, and songs. She worked to translate into Inpuiaq, hymns she sang in the Evangelical Covenant Church.

She was named Mrs. Arctic Native Brotherhood Queen in Nome, Alaska in 1982-and greeted finishers of the famed 1049-mile Iditarod Sled Dog Race.

She was named Elder of the Year for the ANCSA Corporations Bering Straits Native Corporation and Council Native Corporation for sharing and passing on the knowledge of the cultural traditions of her people.

In 1933, she married Albert A. Johnson of Council, Alaska; and together they made a family of seven children-five of whom are still alive. Following the tragic passing of one of her daughters, she and her husband opened their home and helped raise three granddaughters; but they opened their hearts to everyone including their lifelong friends and relatives and the friends of their children as well as their numerous grandchildren and greatgrandchildren.

In addition to her husband, Mom was preceded in death by her parents, Eunice and Matthew Kokochuruk, her siblings, Bertha, Charlie, Edwin, Belinda, Rosa, and Job and her children Wallace, Allen, and Loretta; and grandchildren, Lynette, Tony, and Jon.

Surviving her are her children Clarence, John, Frances, Carolyn, and Pearl as well as her granddaughters Phyllis, Rene', Loretta and Sharon; grandson Bryan, numerous grandchildren and great-grandchildren and extended family members Ruth Mah-nga-ruk and Donald Storms of Washington State and Sharon Watson of Arkansas and close and special friend, Sheila Vreeland Of Anchorage.

Mother's life was enriched and extended by the quality of care she received from the doctors, nurses, and the staff of the Quyana Care Center as well as the care of Mrs. Jamie Nanestad.

Numerous family members and friends took time to visit her at QCC during her stay there or inquired after her. For that, Mother's family is deeply indebted to each and every one of you. Each of you helped in your own way to support, encourage, and extend her life and for that we thank you with all our hearts.

She credited her longevity to a lifelong trust and faith in God—as well as having been raised on a healthy diet of fish, marine mammals, waterfowl and their eggs, as well as a wide variety of wild greens and berries. Well into her nineties, her stated goal was to live to be 100 years old. Only by the grace of God and with HIS help, she achieved that on April 23, 2010.

On the occasion of her 99th birthday, when asked if she had anything to say, without hesitation, Mother led us in the Lord's Prayer.

Jerry Austin

Jerry Austin

The funeral went with little fan-

People from the community came out to support the family, but there was no extra ceremony nor dignitaries making speeches. There was, however, a ripple across the state and world at the passing of an icon of Norton Sound. News spread rapidly about the loss of Jerry Austin, Iditarod musher, big game guide and rural businessman. Those who hadn't spent time with Jerry over the past year or so were shocked to learn of his death at a too-young 62. His vibrant love of life and perpetual motion had indicated that he would probably live to a ripe old age. Nonetheless, Jerry passed out of this life late on the evening of June 2.

There are a lot of good men who provide for their wives and families. There are quite a few who are also good businessmen, building prosperity for themselves and others. There are even fewer yet who find additional time to guide rock stars and millionaires on world-class fishing and hunting trips. The list becomes a single entry when a man does all the above and is an Iditarod Hall of Famer, with 18 races (12 in the top 20), three Sportsmanship Awards and a Humanitarian Award. This is the man Jerry Austin was.

Jerry was born in Seattle in 1947, graduated from the University of Washington with two degrees and came to our "neck of the woods" as a VISTA (Volunteers In Service to America) volunteer in 1969. His desire to help others led him to Stebbins, but his immediate love for rural Alaska kept him in the region. After his VISTA tenure. Jerry was hired by Northern Commercial Co. to help handle fuel in St. Michael. He soon took over management of the Chevron fuel storage and disposal, moving permanently to St. Michael. A beautiful young local girl caught his eye and he married Clara Lockwood on April 23, 1977.

Dogs were a part of Jerry's life almost from the time he got to Norton Sound. He was unafraid to ask questions and quick to learn, and by 1976 he was entered into the Iditarod Race, then in its third race. He became a fixture in the race, finishing in the top 10 in only his second running and placing third in 1982 in a mad dash to the finish line with Rick Swenson and Susan Butcher.

His competitive nature pulled the best out of himself and his dogs, but he never placed a higher finishing position above the health of his dogs or another racer. Numerous times he made an assist for another musher, acts that would impact his placement. Most notably he and a couple of other mushers saved the life of fellow racer Mike Madden, who had fallen ill on the trail. One would be hard-pressed to find a competitor who hadn't been helped by Jerry in some way during his Iditarod career.

When the Iditarod Hall of Fame inaugural class was announced in 1997 it was no surprise that Jerry was named a charter member. He and Clara continued their connection with the race as annual sponsors of the Rookie of the Year award.

Jerry loved the wilderness that he had adopted as home. This affection became a major part of his life and livelihood when he obtained his hunting guide's license and began leading people like rocker Ted Nugent, baseball pitcher Bruce Sutter and NFL icon Larry Csonka on hunts for the big coastal brown bear, moose and other Alaskan big game. His hunts have resulted in numerous entries into the Boone and Crockett record books and his reputation as world-class guide (and storyteller) spread globally. Many of his stories can be found in the pages of books like "Alaska Bear Tales" by Larry

With the need for a hunting camp, Jerry and Clara decided to build a base at the mouth of the Golsovia River, 40 miles east of their home in St. Michael. This tent frame evolved over the years to become a first-rate guide camp, currently boasting running hot water, showers, hot tub and beautiful setting. This became the home away from home for their family and the many friends with whom they shared it. With great wildlife viewing, great fishing and exclusive access, it is every guide's dream location. With the more recent addition of dog-sled touring to the Austin's Alaska Adventures a second camp has been set up as well.

Jerry did not allow all of this to encroach on his attention to his family. With the addition of Dena and then Jerrine, Charlene and Tony, he became a doting father, taking them with him on his adventures and including them in his work. He was a rabid fan of anything they did, often following them (with Clara) to their academic and athletic events. Each of the children grew to be integral parts of Jerry's businesses as he taught them what they would need to carry on if he wasn't there. With the more recent addition of grandchildren this continued.

Jerry Austin lived a full life, albeit one that ended too soon. He laughed and loved with the best of us. He didn't meet a challenge he was afraid to overcome and shared his spirit and enthusiasm for life with all he encountered. No one who met him forgot this vibrant quality. He passed from this world peacefully leaving a void that will be difficult at best to fill. His legacy of hard work, success and vitality will live on in the hearts of his family and friends.

that stands on the seaside of Front Street across from the Pioneer Hall.

"I get really warm and fuzzy over this project," he said. "They need a new building, I thought. This building is a priority with me, to get the land, to get financing, to get contracting."

Besides local officials, the work session included representatives from Bering Straits Native and Sitnasuak Native corps., the governor's office (via phone), and state Department of Commerce.

Alaska Gold Co. has available and would like to sell land north of town; Sitnasuak Native Corp. would like to sell a large lot it owns on Front Street across from Board of Trade Saloon and construct the building to suit the state and lease it back, a solution that likely goes against state procurement laws. The state DOT&PF has sights set on the AGC land at the north end of Steadman Street. At the direction of his superiors, DOT&PF Project Manager Matt P. Desalernos has pushed ahead preliminary plat approval and environmental assessment work at the Steadman site. That work is on hold. Desalernos said Monday, pending the go-ahead and last word on a building site.

"It's still up in the air. I'm not anticipating an answer in the next week," he said. "I'd like to move past the controversy and get something done."

Desalernos said he began last summer by trying to find out which agencies were interested—only the current occupants of the state building or all state offices.

He wanted "to at least have some sideboards on our cost estimates," he said. Preliminary conversations with the city showed sites downtown not large enough for all agencies, Desalernos said. He looked at the AGC site and a couple of sites on the Bypass Road and started negotiations with AGC. He submitted a preliminary plat to the Nome Planning Commission. But other people became involved and Nome Common Council passed a resolution approving the gold company site, and a month later, when the mud hit the fan, reversed its stand in favor of Front Street.

The whole issue then went above "my pay rate" to sort out, Desalernos said.

Front Street business people, including four members of Nome Common Council, do not want to see agency offices leave Front Street, further emptying the main drag. Sitnasuak and Bering Straits Native corporations do not want to lose rent from offices in the Sitnasuak office building and the Old Federal Building.

"Vacating the agencies from our building is going to hold a negative impact for us and our shareholders," Sitnasuak CEO Trudy Sobocienski said. Sitnasuak currently rents 9,400 square feet on Front Street to state Department of Labor, Division of Motor Vehicles, Public Assistance, Public Defender and Alaska State Troopers.

Sitnasuak got involved when the Nome Chamber of Commerce started meeting with Front Street property owners to lobby for keeping the offices on Front Street. She and other Sitnasuak executives contacted the governor's office to propose a private entity-state partnership where the state would lease and eventually own the office building. A lease arrangement would fall under the Department of Administration's purview, rather than DOT&PF.

"Look at the human perspective," Councilman Jerald Brown said. "What is it going to do? It will have a negative impact on a number of businesses, a negative impact on the City of Nome, property values on Front Street will drop," and it will have a negative impact on the economy of Nome.

Some residents do not want to see traffic congestion on Steadman and in the Sixth and Seventh avenues area. They say that a mix of state employees going to work and children heading to school puts people in danger.

State DOT personnel say the space needed to include all state agencies and keep the justice system offices—Alaska State Troopers, probation offices and the like—under one roof will require around 60,000 square feet and a bigger site than any on Front Street. Law enforcement agencies need to be together for common security facilities. Front Street proponents say the footprint of the building could be less, more like 30,000 square feet in three or four stories.

That would make a giant building higher than anything else on Front Street, Desalernos said. He advised people to go look at the four-story infrastructure of the new hospital on Seventh Avenue to see what a building that high would look like.

There are rumblings afoot concerning a site that would combine the Sitnasuak lot with dirt under the Old Pharmacy Building and the Laundromat/bar with the vacation of the Lane's Way right-of-way.

Unless the city insists on onsite parking, that scheme could yield close to a 40,000-foot building, Desalernos said. The way that could work would be for the city to purchase the land from Sitnasuak, Jim West Jr. and the Sackett family, then offer the whole package for sale to the state. The state will not negotiate with a combination of owners to piece together a site, Desalernos said.

The idea of Sitnasuak building the state facility and leasing it back to the state has met with a lukewarm reception from state officials who point out that state procurement law bars sole-source job awards without the competitive bidding process. DOT personnel said they would seek the advice of state procurement specialists on that concept, but the idea probably did not have legs, because a lease arrangement would have to go out to competitive bids that would all be measured against a predetermined set of requirements.

So far, Sitnasuak has not said whether they would be willing to sell their large piece of property on Front Street outright without building and leasing the building.

NACTEC honors late Rep. Foster

Submitted by NACTEC

A crowd gathered June 7 at the Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center House to celebrate the accomplishments of Nome's longtime legislator, Richard Foster.

As a tribute to the late Representative, NACTEC Director Douglas J. Walrath led the ceremony and presented his family with a plaque in recognition of Foster's leadership, dedication, service and hard work in support of vocational education for all rural Alaskans. Foster was successful in the passage of HB 239 in 2001. This bill established a regional learning center as a four-year pilot program to see if such centers would be a viable alternative for rural Alaska vocational education

Since the inception of NACTEC, the program has served over 1,500 students in the Bering Strait School District and Nome Public Schools. As a testament to the program and its ability to meet student needs for developing employability skills, NACTEC has also attracted students from the Chugach, Lake and Peninsula, Kuspuk, Northwest Arctic Borough, Tanana, and Yukon/Koyukuk school districts in recent years.

Foster was a proponent of vocational education, believing that a regional boarding school could provide the means to teach vocational skills, job-related and living skills not available in high schools of small isolated communities. "We need to be looking at creative ways to give our students every opportunity to build their career awareness and skills so they can go back to their home towns ready for work," Foster said, according to his press statement released shortly after the successful passage of HB 239 in 2001.

Since the bill was passed, career and technical education has progressed through the development of a collaborative infrastructure. The Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center is a joint venture of the Bering Strait School District and Nome Public Schools. Its continued success is accomplished through cooperation and partnerships with Kawerak Inc., University of Alaska Fairbanks/Northwest Campus, Norton Sound Health Corp., Bering Straits Native Corp., the Nome Common Council and the 16 communities of the Bering Strait region.

Neal Foster, who was appointed by Gov. Sean Parnell to the vacancy left by his father, was in attendance to accept a plaque on behalf of his family. Neal Foster emphasized that support of the regional training center model took the efforts and beliefs of others, such as Sen. Donny Olson, in addition to his father to evolve into what has become NACTEC. His father's legacy and support for vocational education lives on through recent tax credit legislation. Neal Foster referred to the support of both Bering Straits Native Corp. and SIU Alaska Corp., a subsidiary of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., which each made $200,000 donations to NACTEC through a HB 61 tax credit program in 2009. The support of local partners through this tax credit program will sustain career and technical education through

NACTEC in the years to come.

A plaque will be permanently displayed at the NACTEC House honoring Rep. Richard Foster and his efforts to promote vocational education, while serving as a reminder to all of the students, staff, partners and the public of the many successful partnerships formed since NACTEC's inception.

Preparing for the allergy season

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Soon the air will fill with the smell of blooming fireweed, berries, willows, and tundra. For people who suffer from seasonal allergies, these smells of summer mean an increase in nasal congestion, sinus infections, and runny noses.

The symptoms of seasonal allergies result from an overactive immune system and excess production of a normal amount of nasal mucus. Here is a piece of trivia you will likely wish to forget: the sinus cavity and nasal passages of a healthy adult produce 1.3 fluid ounces of mucus per hour. That means in a 24-hour period you will sniff, blow, wipe, or swallow a full quart of mucus, every day.

While this may sound a little gross and admittedly a more appropriate topic for a junior high audience, the process of mucus production is biologically important, and understanding its purpose can help treating problems that arise when the nose and sinuses go into over-production as the tundra begins to spread its pollen throughout the region.

The nasal cavity and sinuses are designed to produce a constant, almost imperceptible, flow of mucus that forms a protective coating over the inner surface of the upper airway. The mucus captures particles of dust, pollen, viruses, and airborne bacteria. Mucus is full of antibodies that kill or inactivate bacteria and viruses.

When a harmful virus or bacteria is detected, defense cells release a substance called histamine, which leads to increased mucus production and swelling of nasal tissues as blood flow increases to the area bringing white blood cells and nutrients to fight off the infection.

Furthermore, mucus acts as a natural humidifier for the deeper portions of the airway. Air moving into the nasal cavity picks up moisture from the mucus lining and the mucus lining, in turn, absorbs moisture from expired air as it passes out of the nasal passage.

Microscopic hairs, called cilia, line the airway and wave in a coordinated fashion to create a flow of mucus out of sinuses through the nasal cavity to the back of the throat where the mucus is usually swallowed. Interestingly, chemicals in tobacco smoke paralyze these cilia, making it more difficult for people who smoke to clear mucus from the airway, leading to the typical smoker's cough. The function of these cilia improves within a few days of smoking cessation.

People who develop a problem with excess production of mucus and sinus congestion in reaction to certain allergens like pollen or dust have what is called allergic rhinitis. This problem occurs when a person's nasal cavity responds to dust or pollen particles as if they were infectious bacteria or a virus. If the problem persists, it is called chronic rhinitis.

Treatment is appropriate when excess production of mucus interferes with healthy breathing patterns and disrupts daily activity or sleep.

Non-drug therapy with nasal saline, or the use of a Neti pot, can help break up mucus and improve clearance of the upper airway. Staying well hydrated during times of illness or exposure to allergens serves much the same purpose, as the body will use the extra fluid to improve the flow of mucus from the sinuses and nasal passage.

Over the counter medications, called anti-histamines, like diphen-hydramine (Benadryl), cetirizine (Zyrtec), or loratadine (Claritin) block the body's response to allergens, dust, and pollen. These are best taken before exposure to known allergens.

Guaifenesin, a medication found in many cough syrups and cold medications like Robitussin or Mucinex, breaks up mucus and allows for increased clearance of thick mucus.

Pseudoephedrine (Sudafed) is a decongestant that may be taken for short periods to reduce the swelling of tissues in the nose and sinuses.

Stronger antihistamines and nasal steroids are helpful for many patients with chronic rhinitis, but these medications have more serious side effects and must therefore be prescribed and taken under the direction of a physician.

Both prescribed and over-thecounter medications taken for nasal or sinus congestion can increase a person's blood pressure and place further strain on the heart. Therefore, patients with hypertension or heart disease should discuss appropriate use of decongestants and antihistamines with their provider.

Appropriate treatment of seasonal allergic rhinitis can mitigate the effects of seasonal allergies and make summertime in the outdoors more enjoyable.

Nome Eskimo Community gives kids a jump start on learning

Lester Keller remembers when was attending Nome Public Schools in the late 1960s, the breakfast program was just beginning. "They fed us Sailor Boy crackers and salami," he told Nome Elementary School

Saying it Sincerely

By Pastor Everett Arnold For the Nome Ministerial Associate

Some of us may have heard the story of Elijah and the widow's son at church this week [I. Kings 17:17-24]. The widow's son is dead. His body is dead. But first his spirit was dead. The widow's spirit was dead too. And the spirits of lots of other people around her were dead.

Our spirits are dead when we do not draw new life from God every day. Then the rest of us slowly dies too. And our life becomes a story about our dying. That story may go on and on. We may even wish it would end. But it goes on. And the story of our dying will go on until we confess faith in God. Then new life comes from God each day. And our story becomes one about being spiritually alive instead.

In the story of Elijah and the widow's son, only Elijah's spirit is still alive. He respects, loves, trusts, and serves God. So he takes his grief to God: "O Lord my God, hast Thou brought calamity even upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son?" It's honest-to-God prayer. It's trusting-God-to-care prayer. Then God does care. God takes Elijah's grief, the widow's suffering, and the boy's death into God's own heart. God uses God's messenger to carry life from God into the dead boy. It's life for the boy's body and life for the boy's spirit. This brings life to the boy's mother also. Her spirit comes to life. She confesses faith: "Now I KNOW that you are a man of God, and that the word of the Lord in your mouth is truth." She, her son, and God's messenger will live through what's killing the spirits of people all around them.

There can be stories in our lives. They may be killing our spirits. And we might wish they would just end. But those stories will not end until we confess faith in God. Then our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ would help us end those stories. He would open His heart to us. Our Savior would open His own divine heart to feel our hurts with us. He would share our hurts. He would feel our pain along with us. Jesus would help us take our hurts to the Heavenly Father in honest-to-God prayer. Our Savior would share His spiritual energy with us. He would give life to our spirits. He would give life to our bodies.

Then we could live in a new story – a story like that of the widow's dead son who was raised to a new kind of life.

Great Job!

I express my appreciation to the Boy Scouts for the astounding number of bags of trash that they cleaned up on the highway...most notably Dry Creek. They started working at 9 a.m. and Drý Creek. They started working at 9 a.m. and didn't stop until 5 p.m.! There were over 60 bags of garbage cleaned up. The boys collected enough bags to have several chances at winning a bike from AC. They won two bikes and AC was gracious enough to exchange the bikes for a large monetary certificate for the Food Bank! Congratulations boys on a job well done and an excellent example of work and service!

Trooper 298 volunteers included Jeremy Knudsen, Daniel Head, Ethan Kelso, Nolan Horner, James Horner (on crutches even), Nathan Evak, Connor Merrill, and Paul Bioff. Special thanks to the Scout leaders and adults who helped! Dr. Mark Kelso, Ron Horner, John Bioff, Arne Handeland, and Kim Knudsen! (I sure hope I'm not forgetting anyone!)

Thank you to the Lion's Club for offering refreshments to these hard workers (and others that worked throughout town). This clean-up effort is a remarkable thing and I'm proud to be part of this community!

students during the school's May 27 awards assembly. "A lot of us came early to get the breakfast."

Keller was on hand to present a gift to the Nome Elementary School, a $20,000 check to fully fund the breakfast program for the 2010-2011 school year, from Nome Eskimo Community.

Research directly links nutrition to school performance. The Center on Hunger, Poverty and Nutrition Policy has found undernourished children tend to have lower standardized test scores and are more likely to become sick and miss school. Research also suggests that skipping breakfast can affect the intellectual performance of a student. Breakfast is also a substantial source of daily nutrients. Greater proportions of children who skip breakfast fail to meet dietary guidelines on key nutrients than those children who eat breakfast.

Nome Eskimo Community has been active in providing academic opportunities for NPS students, including the after-school tutoring program. "But we know many kids don't come to school ready to learn," said Marsha Sloan, Tribal Services Director for NEC. NEC's Tribal Council found an easy answer to help the students in Nome succeed—have breakfast available to all students

"Nome Eskimo has been funding the breakfast program at Nome Elementary School for several years now," Sloan said. "It's a big commitment that NEC has made to the students. Hopefully, it can give them a good start and they can be ready to learn every day."

Thank you!

The quality of care, compassion, patience and understanding given residents of the Quyanna Care Center at Norton Sound Health Corporation by the staff-aides, employees, nurses and doctors cannot be overstated or more greatly appreciated. Our Mother, Mrs. Frances Johnson, was fortunate enough to have been cared for and loved by the ENTIRE staff. That she lived to achieve her stated goal of 100 years of age, we can only credit to the ill of God, and to the highest level of care she received during her stay there. To the current and past employees of the Quyanna Care Center, we gratefully extend to each of you our heartfelt thanks and appreciation for a JOB VERY WELL DONE! QUYANNAQ-PUK! For the love you showed her, we thank you. For the care you gave her, we thank you. For the trust we enjoyed while she was in your care, words seem inadequate to express to each of you our heartfelt thanks and appreciation for the treatment she received while she was there.

We know that you will miss her--maybe not in the same sense as we, her family, will. But, our hearts go out to each of you when you reminisce about her and what she meant to you. Quyanaq-puk. GOD BLESS EACH AND EVERYONE OF YOU!!!

On April 23, 2010, many of you joined us to celebrate the occasion of the 100th Birthday celebration of our Mother, Mrs. Frances Johnson. On June 3, 2010, you took time to share with us the Celebration of Life for our Mother, whom our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ took home on May 29, 2010.

During her lifetime, you may have visited her. You may have shared something with her. You may have inquired after her or shared memories of her with us. For anything you may have done or said about her, we are eternally grateful and appreciative that you took the time to share the moment with us.

QUYANNAQ-PUK for the flowers, the smiles, the hugs, the tears, the food--but mostly for being there to help to lift our burden in our final farewell to a very gracious lady, a humble woman, a worker, a seamstress, a loving wife, a caring Mother, Grandmother, Great-Grandmother, a friend, and a woman whose unending faith and trust in our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ helped her to achieve her dream of living to be 100 years old. Without your help, the help of her care-givers, and MOST IMPORTANTLY Our Heavenly Father, she may not have accomplished that. QUYANNAQ-PUK!!!

meaning the issue dies without a discussion, let alone a vote. Nickels failed a second time in the meeting when she attempted to bring forth a motion to release the contents of a closed-door session that was held just before the board voted on the contracts Jan. 12.

Other familiar faces, like Lloyd Perrigo and Liz Korenek-Johnson, stepped up to the podium June 8 to again ask that the two released administrators be informed as to why they were not retained. "I believe the single action you can take tonight that will have the most impact on us...is to give letters to Mrs. Sullivan and Mr. Boyer telling them truthfully why their contracts were denied in January," Perrigo said.

Like Boyer, Perrigo pointed out that two of the remaining three board members had voted to retain the two administrators and questioned the installation of new leadership at Nome-Beltz when there has been so much turmoil within the district and turnover at the school. "Almost half of our teachers are going to be gone next year," he said. "It's important to bring stability back."

Perrigo also offered concerns that hiring Gast as the new principal may not deliver that stability. Perrigo mentioned reading a news article from Texas detailing how Gast had resigned from his last principal job after coming under question for fiscal issues.

According to an August 2008 story in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, Gast was put on administrative leave and ultimately resigned after questions arose over personal checks cashed against the Mansfield High School's activity fund. Gast was cited as acknowledging the practice, saying the checks were mostly written to pay for his high-schoolaged daughter's school fees. He also noted that he was upfront about it and that no money ever went missing. Gast's former school district did not find any criminal wrongdoing on his part and dropped its investigation after he resigned in April 2008. He spent the next school year in Wisconsin taking care of his ill father.

Nome school board member Timbers spoke in Gast's defense at the meeting, noting that he had been upfront and transparent in discussing the issue with the hiring committee. "It was something we were able to look into and look beyond," Timbers said.

Timbers repeatedly highlighted that it was a well-rounded group that made up the hiring committee, and a group that repeatedly backed Gast as the top candidate for the job. "We had a really diverse group, as many as 15 different people in the room at some times," she said. "This gentleman consistently received the highest rating from everyone in the room."

Before casting her dissenting vote, Nickels said she had attended the public interview with the two leading candidates the previous week. "Mr. Gast had the right answers to all the questions," she said. While the other candidate in that interview had hinted at not wanting a long-term job in Nome, Nickels questioned how long Gast may stay. "I have concerns about him being new to Alaska and being a short-timer," she said.

Other administrative positions still in limbo

With the hiring of Gast as principal, the district's next administrative spot that needs filling is the assistant principal position.

Boyer, the man who just finished serving in that role, has requested at nearly every meeting since Jan. 12 the reason his contract was not renewed. He later received a letter from the district citing budget concerns and the possibility of the position not being funded for the next year. Once the board approved a budget with the position included and the City of Nome voted to supply the district's request for funds, Boyer began asking for reconsideration.

Board member Nickels again pushed the issue to no avail at the June 8 meeting. "We're still holding Doug Boyer hostage even though we said when the city approved our budget we would speak to it," Nickels said.

Superintendent Wehde spoke to the matter, noting that before the district could look to fill the assistant principal position, it first needed to find someone to staff the principal's office. "It's best to have the principal be an integral part of the hire team. With a principal on board, then the search goes forth," Wehde said.

The district is also on hold as far as announcing who will be principal at Nome Elementary School next year. At a May 11 board meeting, Wehde reported David Keller will return to the district as a principal at one of the district's schools while also directing the special education program. In a later interview, Wehde said he would be inclined to have Keller serve at the elementary school if the position opens.

Nome Elementary School principal Shari Biscotti was on paid administrative from April 1 to May 24 after it was discovered her administrative credentials had been revoked in California just as she started working in Nome last year. Biscotti's standing with Nome Public Schools is in limbo while a state board investigates her credentials.

Wehde said the state investigation is still pending and Biscotti has been on medical leave since May 24. Wehde said Keller will be assigned a position in the district once Biscotti's status with the district is confirmed one way or the other.

Callahan to return as activities director

The board gave its blessing to another position June 8, approving the return of Pat Callahan as activities director for Nome-Beltz.

Callahan, who has served in the role for years, faced a prolonged wait last year before the board finally offered him the contract for the position. "This is a topic that has not gone without scrutiny in my time at Nome Public Schools," Wehde said as the agenda item came up June 8.

Whatever sticking points that had the board delay its decision in the past seemed to be settled as the board voted unanimously to have Callahan serve another year in the role. "I must say as your superintendent, Patrick's performances has been exactly what the district needs in good times as in lean," Wehde said. "We are going into lean times... With new coaches coming on, it's good to have Pat Callahan with experience at the helm."

New board members sought

Down to only three members, the Nome Board of Education is now tasked with filling its ranks. The district has asked for letters of interest from interested candidates who would serve out the terms of McComas and Payenna until the fall elections. Letters were due to the district office by 4 p.m. June 15.

As of press time mid-day June 15, Karmun said she knew of three candidates, Barb Amarok, Jennifer Reader and Wilma Osborne, who had submitted letters of interest.

The school board will hold an evaluation of candidates and selection of new members at a public meeting scheduled to be held at the Nome Elementary School library June 22 at 5:30 p.m. The three members will pose questions to each candidate at the public forum. The candidates will all be present at the same time, alternating who answers first. As in past practice, the board members will rate each respondent's answer. Those emerging with the highest tally after the question-and-answer session will be appointed and sworn in immediately.

The June 8 board meeting marked the first gathering of the board since the prolonged recall election for the entire board was certified. The May 25 vote, in which a margin of anything more than 10 votes was considered substantial, required multiple recounts and saw results bounce back and forth for one member who was ultimately recalled.

Both the recalled members, Payenna and McComas, sat in the audience June 8. Payenna took the opportunity to comment as a citizen at the start of the meeting. She thanked those who voted for her in the three elections that marked her short run as a school board member—the initial vote in October 2009, a runoff election in which she gained her seat weeks later, and the recall election which she lost by six votes.

Payenna also took the opportunity to criticize Nickels and those who have been critical of the board's move to not retain the two administrators, saying they had been badgering the board. "You're not helping the process," she said, directing the comment at many of those seated in the room. "You want to talk about the school board micro-managing, what do you think you're doing right now?"

Payenna's comments spurred a retort from Korenek-Johnson, a parent and elementary school teacher who has approached the board at nearly every meeting to ask that the administrators be given reasons as to their refusal of contracts. "I'm a little offended at the moment to think that the board considers my standing here offering my concern as a public member as badgering," Korenek-Johnson said.

She went on to ask that Boyer and Sullivan be given their jobs back if no justifiable reason could be given for not retaining them for next year.

Michels steps off the campaign trail

Citing the need to dedicate her attention to her job at Kawerak Inc. and her duties as mayor for the Democratic nomination for the lieutenant governor's seat June 18.

"It was a very difficult decision to make, it felt like my heart sunk into my stomach,' she said later in the day after she had made her announcement.

Michels, indeed, sounded weary and saddened during a June 18 interview. She said the of Nome, Denise Michels abandoned her bid challenges of jumping into the campaign late, along with issues surrounding travel and fundraising became overwhelming. "New stuff is always popping up constantly, and they are equally important, and I just wanted to do a good job," she said.

Michels announced her candidacy in late April, but little noise was heard from the campaign until Friday's announcement. Michels was playing the roles of both candidate and campaign team all on her own. "Trying to fundraise and be effective is very time-consuming," she said.

The issue of travel also worked as a doubleedged sword for Michels. To be able to attend debates, forums and simply get her name out around the larger population centers in the state, Michels needed to get out of Nome and largely onto the state's road system—which does not come cheap. "I wanted to go to the Fairbanks debate their chamber had, but to go to a onehour meeting, it would have taken me two days

School board fills ranks with Osborne, Amarok

By Tyler Rhodes

The Nome Board of Education filled its ranks Tuesday night by selecting Wilma Osborne and Barb Amarok to fill the seats of two members recalled by voters earlier in the month.

Amarok and Osborne, along with a third candidate, Jennifer Reader, were asked eight questions by Nome Public Schools Superintendent Jon Wehde in a public form at a special board meeting held at the elementary school June 22. Osborne and Amarok were sworn immediately to fill the seats formerly held by Heather Payenna and Albert McComas.

Both Amarok and Osborne are pursuing doctoral degrees in educationrelated fields. In her introduction, Amarok said she previously had worked for Nome Public Schools for 20 years, serving as a classroom teacher, the Native programs coordinator and the assistant principal at Nome-Beltz. She currently works at the University of Alaska Fairbanks Northwest Campus. Osborne currently works at the recently established Nome Native Arts Center. Reader said she had recently retired from the Alaska Army National Guard after 20 years of service and has worked at both the Nome Public Schools district office and the elementary school.

The process had all three prospective members in the room at once, each taking turns at being the first to answer the successive questions. Osborne and Amarok both held the advantage of having worked on the large committee that formed the district's new strategic plan, which is to be implemented as a guiding philosophy of how the district will move forward. The two new members referred to the plan heavily in nearly all of their responses, and one question specifically targeted the plan.

Immediately after being sworn in, the first task at hand for the new members was the approval of contracts for a new assistant principal at the junior high/high school complex, a principal for the elementary school and a new junior high social studies teacher.

By a 4-1 vote, the board approved the hiring of Carmen Russo for the assistant principal's position at Nome-Beltz. Russo, who will receive her administrative credentials this summer, received the "No" vote from board member Barb Nickels, who has been an adamant supporter of Doug Boyer, the assistant principal who the board voted to not bring back for the coming school year. Earlier in the meeting Boyer signaled that he would appeal board's decision to the courts.

Dave Keller will be the district's new special education director and principal at Nome Elementary School. Wehde announced before presenting the contracts to the board that last year's principal, Shari Biscotti, had turned in her resignation. Biscotti had been placed on administrative leave in April after it was discovered her credentials were revoked in California, where she last worked before coming to Nome.

The third hire approved was new junior high social studies teacher Joshua Vaughn, who last taught in Illinois. Both Keller and Vaughn's hires were unanimously approved by the board.

Hey there,

Just got back from playing out a little bit ago. Wow—it's amazing how everything turns green just about overnight. One day we went riding and it was mostly brown, then I go again a couple of days later and its all green. The ice keeps persisting though.

It is truly disappointing to go to the store and see something like a can of milk for $2.15 or $2.20 and fresh fruit, such as apples and oranges costing $15 for a bag. That is just crazy. How do they expect us to get ahead that way, much less feed our children a healthy meal?

I know we are lucky here in Alaska that we are able to get help with the school lunch program, and I am grateful, but it has nothing to do with the prices that we face.

The government expects all of us to go out and get jobs. So where are all those jobs? Just because people do not qualify for unemployment does not mean that there are more people who have jobs, it just means they are less able to support their families. Shame on this government of ours.

Then again they are allowing more immigrants into the U.S. So tell me, how are we supposed to feed them when sometimes we can't even feed ourselves? I hate to seem callous but I would like to see them go back to where they came from and fight for their own rights, just as we do for ours. We do not need to worry about more mouths to feed or have to deal with the hassle that might come from some of them in the form of crimes

Instead, we need to try to find solutions to help our people, so that things like crime (stealing) do not happen because someone thinks they need to do so to feed their family. Oh, and the price for 12 rolls of tissue it is over $15. Are they trying to make us go back to using catalogs as tissue or what?

I hope all of you have a great summer. At the moment I'm trying to get my kids going so we could plant the garden. Take care all. As always, Karen Nanouk Unalakleet, AK

Renaissance

We need a make over for the city of Nome. We need to get rid of the derelict buildings. We have a lot of them, but the one that gives Nome the biggest black eyesore is the old Wein Building on Front Street and Hunter Way, just across the street from City Hall. We need to have owners clean up vacant lots. We need to tear down the health hazards and firetraps. This means get rid of them, not wait for aristocrats to assume the responsibility. Nome's Front Street /downtown area needs to be revitalized.

Nomeites need to think outside the box— the "big box" look for the design of new buildings like the proposed new state office building is not something we would want to encourage. A whole bunch of money would surely spur us onward for a Nome Renaissance. Our only problem is the absence of funds. However, it doesn't take money to make plans and it doesn't take big bucks to generate civic pride, pick up the trash, plant some flowers and get rid of the junk. We could set out a few park benches so Nomeites and visitors could rest their weary feet. It's a wonder we don't have a major infestation of rats nesting in our old trash heaps.

Our seawall and waterfront areas have a great deal of potential. They could be made very visitor friendly. Renaissance takes initiative and leadership. We can't afford to let our town stagnate into indifference. Let's get involved and encourage our city leaders to take command of Nome's Renaissance. - N.L.M.-

Summer gets a sunny and smoky start in Nome

As if on cue, the thermometer in Nome pushed the mercury on past 70°F for the first time in 2010 on the official start of summer Monday.

The June 21 high of 70°F, hit just after 10 p.m., and was the first time since Aug. 4, 2009 that Nome experienced such warmth. Only four days in 2009 were 70°F or warmer. Nome was expected to reach at least 70°F on Tuesday and Wednesday, and possibly again on Thursday, according to the National Weather Service.

Nome saw the most days over 70°F in 1977 at 19. In 2001, the temperature never climbed above 69°F.

referenced to Mean Lower Low Water (MLLW).

Nome averages four days a year above 70°F.

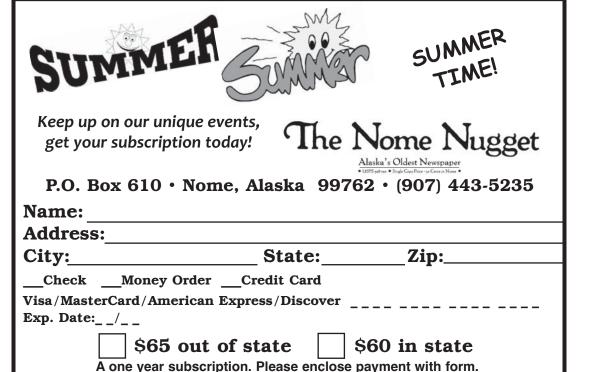

The start of summer also got a bit smoky late Monday night and early Tuesday morning as winds from the north drove smoke that likely came from the center of the Seward Peninsula toward Nome. A smoky haze covered the countryside around 1 a.m. Tuesday just north of Nome.

According to the Alaska Interagency Coordination Center, an approximately 30-acre fire near Birch Creek was burning uncontrolled as of Tuesday morning. The center reported the fire as being located approximately 14 miles east of the Kougarok Road where it crosses the Kuzitrin River. A status report from the center said the fire was reported by flight services and was burning in flat tundra. The center said it would continue to monitor the fire.

Another fire was reported at the Paragon River, approximately 12 miles due north of Council. The Alaska Interagency Coordination Center said the fire was initially reported by flight services. The center said a subsequent check of the area did not encounter any smoke or black spots.

Gulf oil spill impacts Alaska

Alaska Senator Mark Begich on Monday introduced a bill that would require oil companies to set aside funding for damages in the event of a spill. The Guaranteed Oil Spill Compensation Act of 2010 is co-sponsored by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-OR) and Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-MN). It would require BP or any other company interested in future development of federal oil and gas leases to deposit into an escrow account held by the U.S. government enough money to compensate those affected by a spill.

BP said it would set up a $20 billion escrow account over the next four years to compensate victims of the Gulf of Mexico oil disaster. The proposed bill says that in the event of a spill, the Secretary of Interior makes an assessment of outstanding liability under provisions of the federal legislation passed after the Exxon Valdez disaster, the Oil Pollution Act of 1990. The spiller must then deposit funds into a separate fund equal to the total liability minus the liability established for the incident by the 1990 bill. The Secretary would then administer the fund for claims and costs related to that spill. Unexpended funds would be returned to the spiller five years after the date of deposit or the date the Secretary determines all federal, state, and civil claims have been satisfied.

The measure would have no affect on other liability. The Anchorage Daily News reports that Begich has forwarded the legislation to Sen. Lisa Murkowksi for review, but that she hasn't signed onto it. She is working on her own oil spill legislation that would allow the administration to set liability on offshore oil and gas projects on a case-by-case basis.

While lawmakers work on laws to set up spill funds, the Center for Biological Diversity sued BP and Transocean Ltd., for illegally spewing more than 100 million gallons of oil and other toxic pollutants into the Gulf of Mexico. The suit was filed in federal court in New Orleans. The environmental non-profit says it is the largest citizen lawsuit action ever taken under the Clean Water Act. The Center is seeking the maximum possibly penalty against BP. At a fine of $4,300 per barrel spilled, the Center says, BP is already liable for approximately $11 billion in Clean Water Act penalties. If the spill continues through August 1, BP's liability will be approximately $19 billion.

While the drill moratorium in all waters of the U.S. is still in place. Shell Alaska had to cancel its plans to explore for oil and gas in the Chukchi and Beaufort Sea. After BP announced it would set up a $100 million compensation fund for layed-off oil workers, Governor Sean Parnell was quick to direct Labor and Workforce Development Commissioner Click Bishop to make sure that Alaskans are included in compensation.

AIDEA partners with federal program for renewable energy loans

The Alaska Industrial Development and Export Authority teamed up with the Department of Energy to offer loan guarantees of up to 80 percent of the cost of qualifying renewable energy projects in Alaska. These can include wind farms, geothermal projects and hydroelectric projects. Loan guarantees may also be used for constructing interties that connect newly-developed renewable energy to the grid. There are about $6 billion in this DOE program, which was funded by the American Reinvestment and Recovery Act in 2009. According to the Alaska Energy Authority, there is no allocation by state. Funds for qualified projects are available by application submitted through AIDEA.

Bills signed into law

The 26th Legislature's centerpiece in form of House and Senate bills that now establish a statewide energy policy were signed into law last week. Governor Parnell signed the bills in a ceremony in Anchorage. The House Energy Committee sponsored House Bill 306 and hailed it as a unique piece of legislation. The bill was not drafted by legislators but a group of Alaskans with decades of experience in energy issues. The State Energy Policy lays out five main goals: establishing a statewide energy policy; working toward energy efficiency and conservation; encouraging economic development in Alaska; supporting energy research, education and workforce development; and coordinating governmental functions to support these actions. HB 306 sets the goal for Alaska to generate 50 percent of its electricity through renewable resources by 2025, primarily through hydroelectric projects.

Parnell also signed Senate Bill 220, the Omnibus Energy Bill or the Alaska Sustainable Energy Act, into law. The senate bill pushes for development of Alaska's fossil fuel resources but also incorporates renewable energy potential. SB 220 creates the energy efficiency revolving loan fund and directs the DOT to evaluate state buildings for energy efficiency. The bill also established the Emerging Energy Technology fund, to make grants for demonstration projects of technology that will be commercially viable within five years.

In the past week, Parnell also signed education bills. House Bill 424 places a general obligation bond package on the November ballot. If approved by voters, projects funded by the bonds include University of Alaska facilities, student housing, state library archives and museum. three rural school replacements or renovations and an aquatic facility for Mount Edgecumbe High School. Parnell also signed Senate Bill 237, which extends the 70/30 state/local school construction reimbursement program in urban areas of the state.

Coast Guard markers will guide mariners to Nome harbor

By Laurie McNicholas

U.S. Coast Guard personnel will build and install two range marker lights this week for safe navigation of the entrance to the Nome harbor, reports Harbormaster Joy Baker. She said she has tried to obtain them since 2005.

The Nome Common Council cleared the way for installation of the range markers at a special meeting on Monday by approving an amended ordinance authorizing disposal of a portion of the city's interest in lot 64A, block 57 containing about 400 square feet under a lease agreement with the Coast Guard. The front range marker light will be placed at this beach location

The lease agreement gives the Coast Guard possessory interest in the site for one year with an option to renew the lease for 19 successive one-year periods. The Coast Guard will pay no rent on the property, which is valued at about $25,000, for the entire term of the lease.

The rear range marker light will stand on high ground owned by the city next to the Nome Cemetery. The city granted an easement encroachment license for the navigation aid on a 400-square-foot parcel adjacent to West "I" Street between the cemetery and Blocks 102 and 134.

Coast Guardsman Mike Thommason, USCG damage control specialist second class, answered questions about the range markers at a council meeting on June 14. He said the towers are 7 feet square and 15 feet tall, and the lanterns are 12 to 14 inches in diameter.

Councilman Stan Andersen asked whether the lights would shine directly into residences along the Snake River. "They will not shine directly into residences," Thommason replied. "The lantern has an eight degree range, so off its center, it shines only 4 degrees."

"Why are there two lights?" Andersen asked. Thomasson said when the lights are lined up one on top of the other, they show dead center to mariners at night. In the daytime the towers' red day boards with a vertical white line at center serve the same purpose, he added.

"Can you see them from a mile out?" Anlersen asked

"Yes, sir; they are set up for a 10- to 15-mile range, and you can use the lights as beacons so you know were you are," Thommason said. He said the Coast Guard services navigational aids at Nome, Unalakleet and as far north as Kotzebue. Nomeites may see tower structures suspended beneath helicopters en route to various sites, he noted, adding that many of them get damaged.

Code variance helps NEC give an elder a lift in lifestyle

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission has granted a code variance to allow Nome Eskimo Community to remodel Harriet Simpson's home that sits very close to the property line separating her lot from that of her next-door neighbor, Duffy Halliday.

To avoid a possible illegal decision to let one person build on another person's property, the planning group traded the requested variance for another effective when the house was moved over.

Glen Pardy, NEC housing director, requested the variance so a renovation crew could enlarge the north side of the house where the building does meet the set-back law. The house at 415 Division St. does not meet the five-foot set-back requirement on the south side. The work on that side would involve only painting, the installation of vinyl clad windows, and fire retardant material that could put the side of the house an inch or so over the line.

Neighbor Halladay, away in Fairbanks, sent a letter supporting the request. Halladay urged the planners to approve the variance on set-back that would permit a possible encroachment so that the house would not have to be moved, but expressed a concern that there could be an issue with title insurance.

However, after some discussion, the commission decided it could not approve a variance that would allow a house to encroach on another's property.

"I don't think we have the authority to give a variance to build on another person's lot," Commissioner

Pardy told the commission he had an estimate of $1,500 for getting the house moved over a bit.

Charlie Weiss said.

Move the house, the commission told Pardy, and voted to allow variances on set-backs so the firewall protection could stay inside Simpson's lot

The project will make the 553-square-foot home larger, safer and warmer. Funded by grant money, the 7-foot by 17-foot addition will allow a second bedroom and a modern kitchen and bathroom. The interior plywood walls and paneled ceiling will be gutted and recovered with gypsum wall board, fire-taped and painted. Electrical upgrades will include new wiring and light fixtures, while plumbing upgrades will put in an on-demand water heater, and washer and dryer drain and hookups. New doors will be installed after leveling.

The budget for the project is $150,000, comprising grants from four agencies. Pardy expected the project to be finished in September.

Michels

and $900 to get there," she said.

On a second front, travel for work and other commitments has effectively kept Michels off the campaign trail. Michels said she was to be in South Dakota this week for her job as transportation director for Kawerak, which was to be followed by another week in Greenland for a conference on Arctic issues. Such a travel schedule leaves little time for campaigning. "I thought, those are two weeks where I really need to be out campaigning and getting my name out there," she said.

Her other commitments notwithstanding, Michels also faced a largely uphill battle in getting her name out to a broad state audience. Her main competition in the race was Diane Benson, a candidate who had already battled through a few statewide races, including a run for governor and two campaigns for the U.S. House of Representatives. In 2006 she garnered an impressive 40 percent of the vote in an effort to unseat Alaska's longtime congressman Don Young.

While a late May poll conducted by Strategies 360/DRM Market Research showed most of the polled voters saying they were undecided regarding the Democratic primary for lieutenant governor, Benson gained far more favorable numbers than Michels. Out of 375 likely primary voters polled, 47 said they were undecided, 45 said they would vote for Benson, five said they would vote for Michels and three voiced support for another candidate.

Now that her candidacy is dropped, Michels said she is not yet endorsing any one candidate for either the lieutenant governor's or the governor's race. She said both Democratic candidates for governor, Ethan Berkowitz and Hollis French could serve the state well. "For governor, Ethan and Hollis are very capable. In the couple of debates I've listened to, I think Ethan has a more solid grip on rural issues and solutions, but I think they're both honorable," she said.

Michels' step off the campaign trail mirrors the move made by Bob Poe, a former state commissioner who dropped out of the Democratic race for governor about a week before Michels' departure. That leaves Berkowitz and French as the only two Democratic candidates for the governor's race. Benson is joined in the Democratic lieutenant governor's race by late filers—and largely unknown candidates—Lynette Moreno-Hinz and J.J. "Jack" Powers, both of Anchorage.

Caution urged as musk ox move into yards, trails

By Tyler Rhodes

Those who live or travel around the outskirts of Nome are likely to have encountered summer visitors who have descended from the hills after the long, cold winter.

Now that the area's musk ox—and humans, for that matter—are on the move in the countryside, Alaska Department of Fish and Game officials are asking that people maintain a heightened awareness of our shaggy neighbors for the safety of both man and musk ox.

The neighborhoods around Anvil Mountain and the flanks of Newton Peak have seen an abundance of musk oxen this summer, browsing and generally hanging out near homes; and more than one car has had to wait out a musk ox traffic jam on the Kougarok Road just a few miles out of town.

The proximity of man and beast has already resulted in one musk ox calf meeting an untimely end this year, according to Fish and Game wildlife biologist Letty Hughes. The calf didn't die of any trauma as a result of a car or gun, but by a more indirect connection to humans. "It turns out it got into your everyday plastic bag," Hughes said.

Hughes said Fish and Game was first alerted by a homeowner on the side of Anvil Mountain who called to report the dead calf, and its agitated mother, in their yard. Fish and Game sent the calf off to Fairbanks for a necropsy where it was determined that it had suffocated when a plastic bag became lodged in its throat.

Hughes said the incident provides a couple of good reminders for the public. She noted that with more musk ox closer to homes and the area's population center, people need to be more conscious of the animals' presence. She also expressed her appreciation for the homeowner calling the department to let them know of the dead animal. "Had this not been called in, we would not have known," she said.

With Anvil Mountain popular with hikers, Hughes cautions people to be on the lookout for the animals. With willows currently in full bloom, the musk oxen may be hidden from view until people walk right up on them. When the musk oxen are encountered, they tend to hold their ground. "Basically musk ox are like stubborn goats," Fish and Game biologist Tony Gorn said. "They're not going to respond to you sticking your chest out."

spond to you sticking your chest out."
Hughes said when the animals become stressed they tend to shake their heads or paw the ground. Other signs of stressed musk ox include their tendency to group in a circle or line when approached or when bulls begin butting heads. Gorn recommends giving the animals their space and even running away if they appear agitated. "It's kind of the opposite rules of bears," he said. "Just give them room. Moving away quickly or walking away is completely acceptable with a musk ox where you wouldn't want to run away from a bear."

While the musk oxen may appear to be habituated to humans due to their reluctance to scatter far and wide at our approach, Hughes warns that the animals are prone to sudden mood shifts. "They're very temperamental," she said.

Gorn said people and musk ox have largely interacted well in the area with few reported clashes. One young bull musk ox was shot a few years ago in the Tripple Creek area just north of Nome after it had been charging dogs, cars and people for days. There have also been reports of a few encounters between dogs and musk ox.

Gorn and Hughes recommend using a sprinkler to help keep the musk ox out of yards and away from houses. A "water wall" seems to deter the animals from approaching, they said. Otherwise, they recommend patience. "If they're on the road or your favorite trail, you're just going to have to wait them out," Hughes said.

Hughes encourages people to report any concerns, observations or questions they may have regarding the area's musk ox population to Fish and Game's Nome office at 443-2271.

Herring harvest posts record high roe recovery

By Laurie McNicholas

Approximately 30 fishermen delivered 622 tons of herring averaging 13.6 percent ripe eggs by weight during this year's Norton Sound herring sac roe fishery, according to preliminary catch figures provided Monday by Jim Menard, Alaska Department of Fish and Game area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue.

"The roe recovery was a record, easily surpassing the previous record of 12.3 percent in 2001," Menard said. "Although there were over 8,000 tons of herring on the quota, the large amounts of ice this year created problems for the fishing fleet being able to catch the 1,000 tons of herring the market was willing to buy. The department thanks the cooperative effort of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. with Icicle Seafoods in bringing back the first sac roe herring fishery since 2006. The department also thanks NSEDC biologists for their huge assistance in flying most of the herring aerial surveys and their assistance to the fishing fleet."

NSEDC set sac roe herring prices on a sliding scale from $140 for 7 percent roe, the minimum accepted for the roe market, to $260 per ton for 13 percent roe.

Menard said Icicle Seafoods' processor and four tenders left Norton Sound Sunday morning for Bristol Bay.

Small fires keep crews hopping

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome's firefighters were kept busy late last week by an old fuel tank that erupted in flames June 17 and a structure fire on Saturday on the north end of Steadman Street. No one was injured in either incident and no major damage occurred.

The fire department was called out to the area adjacent to Nome's softball fields between the city center and high school around 3 p.m. June 17. According to Nome Volunteer Fire Department Chief Matt Johnson, scrap metal collectors working at the site were using a plasma cutter to dismantle the tanks when a residue within the tanks likely ignited. "I think it scared them pretty good," Johnson said.

The demolition of the tanks was part of an Alaska Gold Co. initiative to clean old and unused equipment from its property in and around Nome, according to the company's land manager Nikolai Ivanoff. The tanks are on Alaska Gold land.

After setting up at the site and assessing the situation, firefighters quickly extinguished the fire. From afar, only smoke was visible rising from the tank. Johnson said the department approaches fires of an unknown substance in an enclosed structure like a fuel tank with extreme caution. "Our biggest concern when we arrive on the scene like that is to protect our own people," Johnson said.

Saturday's fire response came early when crews were called out to 605 Steadman Street at Darlene Milligrock's house. Johnson said little about the incident, noting that as of June 21 it was still under investigation by local police and the state fire marshal. Johnson said the house sustained limited damage.

Milligrock said the fire occurred in her bedroom near her bed sometime around 5:30 a.m. "I have no idea how it started," she said. Milligrock said the fire started near the corner of her bed where there was no ignition source, such as an outlet or other electrical device.

Milligrock said she was not home at the time of the fire, noting her two boys and their cousin were at the house at the time. She said the cousin put out the fire before the fire department arrived. "They just had to make sure it was out," she said.

Milligrock, who was home Monday cleaning up the soot and mess in her room left by the fire, said the fire department took her bed and rug for the investigation.

Payenna again tops Gold Dust Dash field

Nearly 50 runners got an early start to the longest Saturday of the year in a chase for paydirt during the 2010 Gold Dust Dash.

With gold nuggets up for grabs for the top two finishers and a third nugget that gets raffled off, there was plenty of motivation to get runners out of bed for the 8 a.m. start. High school runner Teddy Payenna once again set the pace and lined his pockets, taking first by a mere second with a time of 24 minutes, two seconds. Elim cross country coach Nick Schollmeier finished right on Payenna's shoulder at 24:03 in the 3.6-mile race to earn that second gold nugget.

The race takes place on the beach, forcing runners to work their way along, trying to find the firmest sand while avoiding a complete dousing by the incoming waves. The race starts at East Beach, runs to the mouth of the Nome River and returns to the start. Visiting CAMP Summercise intern Christina DiMaria took top honors for the women, finishing in 33:54. Student Rosa Schmidt was the second woman to cross the line at 35 minutes flat.

The third gold nugget given away Saturday morning went to Wilson Hoogendorn in a raffle.

The yearly race held on the Saturday of Nome's Midnight Sun Festival weekend is sponsored by the Norton Sound Health Corp. CAMP Department.

Initiative backers drop out, but Measure One still on ballot

By Diana Haecker

Clean Team Alaska has withdrawn from actively backing a measure that would ban the use of public funds for political campaigns and lobbying, after Lt. Governor Craig Campbell had changed the wording of the measure's title. It now reads that the measure is "(An) initiative prohibiting the use of public funds to lobby or campaign; and prohibiting holders of government contracts and family members from making political contributions." The original ballot measure was titled, "(An) initiative prohibiting public funds for election campaigns; also prohibiting campaign contributions by holders of government contracts." Initiative proponents with Clean Team Alaska said that Lt. Gov. Craig Campbell "unilaterally and capriciously" changed the ballot language to unfairly bias voters against the initiative. In reaction, Clean Team Alaska Chairman and former state legislator Dick Randolph said in a prepared statement, "The current attorney general and lieutenant governor are clearly not acting within the law, and the only course of action we have is a lengthy and costly legal fight with very little expectation of a favorable ruling from a court system that embraces the same culture of corruption as the attorney general and lieutenant

Supporters like to call it an anticorruption measure, but opponents, mostly found in municipal government and union organizations, call it a "gag measure."

According to a legal review by the attorney general, the bill would ban the use of public funds for political campaigns and lobbying. Funds could not be used to support or oppose a ballot measure. The bill would limit political involvement in government contracts. It would ban political contributions by holders of government contracts and their families and it would ban legislators and their staff from being employed by holders of government contracts for two years after leaving state service. The bill has criminal and civil penalties.

In a legal opinion, AG Dan Sullivan said that the initiative consists of two sections. Section 1 is a prohibition on use of public funds for elec-ready in place by Alaska Statute, but adds on a prohibition against the use of public funds to advocate in ballot measure campaigns. Section 1 also prohibits the use of tax revenues or public resources for campaign, lobbying or partisan purposes. Sullivan said that the law now permits the use of public funds in a ballot measure campaign if the legislature or local legislative body appropriates funds for that purpose but prohibits public spending in candidate campaigns. Section 2 prohibits contractors on public works construction projects from making contributions to candi-

Sullivan noted that a potential conflict could come about – if the measure passes – as the legislature can appropriate money for ballot measures. "Thus, it is conceivable that if this ballot measure were enacted, the legislature could, consistent with the constitution, appropriate funds in violation of this provision. We doubt that the courts would enforce against the legislature a statute that restricts the constitutional power of appropriation. Acceptance of such appropriated funds, however, could expose the recipient to criminal and civil sanctions," wrote Sullivan.

Opponents of the measure argue that the bill would limit the ability of families, non-profits, businesses and communities to take part in the political process. The opposition has formed a counter campaign called "Stop The Gag Law" and manager Josh Applebee said that including family members of state contract holders would exponentially increase the number of people potentially affected by this initiative. Applebee said although the backers of ballot initiative 1 withdrew from the active fight for votes, "Stop the Gag Law" coalition would continue to fight against it.

The coalition is made up of a number of Alaska employee associations, business and industry organizations, non-profits and unions. The Alaska State Employee Association, the Alaska Municipal League, AFL-CIO and others have thrown their weight behind the "Stop the Gag" law coalition. Resolutions passed against measure 1 came from 33 organizations and governmental bodies including the Alaska Village Electric Cooperative, Kawerak, the City of Nome, and the villages of Teller, Buckland and Brevig Mission.

It also establishes for the first time a rural school construction fund.

Also signed into law were bills relating to alcohol abuse. Senate Bill 194 increases civil damages for purchasing alcohol for minors. The governor signed two bills affecting the Alcoholic Beverage Control Board. Senate Bill 261, sponsored by Senator Donny Olson, adds a rural seat to the board. Senate Bill 234 extends the board to June 30, 2011. House Bill 98 brings bootlegging penalties in line with DUI penalties and ensures that those convicted for repeat minor consuming will receive increased penalties.

Postal Service mulls reduction of mail delivery

In order to cut costs, the U.S. Postal Service proposed to reduce mail delivery to five days a week. The Postal Regulatory Commission said it would hold field hearings in eight cities in the Lower 48. This prompted Alaska Senators Mark Begich and Lisa Murkowski in addition to the two Hawaiian Senators to request field hearings in Alaska and Hawaii as well. They said in a letter to the commission that mail delivery is different in Alaska and Hawaii, as residents there depend on the post office for basic and necessary items. The commission has said that the nationwide elimination of Saturday mail delivery service is one of the most significant changes ever proposed for the Postal Service.

Supporting literacy, one baby at a time

Submitted by the Nome Literacy Council

On May 28, the Nome Literacy Council delivered 100 book bags to the Outpatient Clinic at the Norton Sound Regional Hospital.

The book bags will be given to new mothers at the hospital for their new baby. The bags include literature from the National Institute on Literacy about why literacy is so important and guidelines for parents. The project also teamed with the Bering Straits Foundation. The foundation approved funding for the purchase of 100 copies of the book "Baby Beluga," selected by the foundation's board. They were happy to be supporting this literacy project and happy to give a book to the new babies born in the Norton Sound region.

The bags also include magnetic letters and a local brochure filled with literacy tips and information on the Imagination Library. The Nome Literacy Council is in charge of raising money for the Imagination Library and signing students up for the program. The Imagination Library provides books to children in Nome ages 0-5. They receive one book a month until they "graduate" from the program at 5 years of age. The program began with grant money and is now locally funded with donations and fundraisers with the Nome Literacy Council. While not all children in the region can sign up for the Imagination Library program, they will still receive a free book thanks to the Bering Straits Foundation in the book bags.

Aside from the new baby book bags, the Nome Literacy Council also helps provide books for the bookrack in the hospital waiting room. Children are able to go over to the bookrack and select a book while they wait for their appointment. Reading is such an important activity. This summer remember to support young readers, take books to camp, read before bed or try to read a book together before playing a game or watching TV. We can all help to support literacy one baby at a time.

Traveling? Moving? Leaving for college? What you should know about contract health services

Indian Health Services provides a limited amount of funding to Norton Sound Health Corporation for the medical care you receive within our region. NSHC does not have funds available to pay for the medical care you may receive while traveling or moving outside of our service unit.

Travelers/Movers:

While traveling, getting sick/hurt is probably the last thing you would like or expect to happen to you. Should you end up in the Emergency Room at a hospital, chances are, you will receive a bill for the medical care you received. In this case, the Alaska Native Medical Center (ANMC) Contract Health Services (CHS) program may be able to provide assistance

The ANMC CHS Traveler/Mover Program grants approval of payment for the emergency medical care you may receive while traveling or moving out-of-state. However, CHS funds are limited. You must follow these requirements for ANMC CHS to authorize payment:

•You or a family member must provide notification to ANMC CHS at 1-800-478-1636 within 72 hours of being treated. After hours, please leave a message stating your full name, date of birth and a contact

• An IHS hospital ("Native Hospital") must be used if available. Visit the Indian Health Services website at http://www.ihs.gov/index.cfm?module=AreaOffices to review the list of facilities.

· If you are moving outside the State of Alaska, ANMC CHS will provide authorization for emergency medical services for 180 days. Please keep all airline tickets, boarding passes, ferry system tickets, and/or gas receipts for proof of the date you left and returned.

• ANMC CHS will need your medical records from the hospital whereyou were treated. You must submit a request for medical records from that hospital and have them sent to ANMC CHS.

Mosquito Bites:

How to avoid and treat this common summer-time annoyance

By Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

It is time to prepare for the annual invasion of our summer-time winged adversary, the mosquito. Knowing a little more about the mosquito may help reduce the number of bites during the summer and relieve the symptoms quickly when prevention

Did you know that the mosquito, one of the world's smallest insects, is also one of the world's deadliest killers? Worldwide millions of people die every year from diseases carried by the mosquito like malaria. dengue fever, yellow fever, and encephalitis.

Mosquito-borne diseases are rare in Alaska, although cases of malaria and encephalitis appear sporadically in people who have returned to Alaska from endemic areas.

Parasites and viruses are transmitted from the mosquito at the time of a bite. Therefore, prevention of bites is considered the most important way to prevent mosquito-borne illnesses whether from a serious viral encephalitis, parasite infestation, or just an annoying itchy rash.

In rural Alaska, the mosquito bite is more a source of annoyance than a source of serious medical problems, but prevention remains an important means of avoiding allergic reactions. Allergic reactions to mosquito bites are caused by proteins, literally digestive enzymes, injected at the time of a bite. The reaction tends to be localized and rarely lasts more than a few hours. In very rare cases, the mosquito bite can lead to a severe anaphylactic reaction resulting in a medical emergency causing difficulty breathing. People in this rare situation should seek immediate medical intervention.

Interestingly, allergic reactions to mosquito bites tend to lessen in strength over a lifetime. Adults exposed to many bites generally react with less severity than children or infants who have had only limited bites. In this way, each mosquito bite is like a small allergy shot that desensitizes the body to future at-

Mosquitoes are not too choosy. However, experts say mosquitoes are more attracted to males, people with type-O blood, and obese individuals. Conversely, there is some evidence that people who take a Bvitamin called thiamine are less attractive to mosquitoes. So if you find yourself in the outdoors in a crowd where the mosquito has a choice, consider standing next to thin females with type A or B blood who have been taking vitamins (of course this is not official medical advice). Mosquitoes are also attracted to exhaled carbon dioxide, certain perfumes, and body heat.

Mosquito repellents come in three forms: topical repellants, fabric repellents, and physical barriers.

Topical repellents work by interfering with the ability of a mosquito to recognize open skin. DEET in concentrations up to 35 percent may be used on anyone over 2 months old. In general, use the lowest concentration needed for the duration of possible exposure. DEET 10 percent will last about two hours. DEET should not be applied to the hands of children who may transfer the chemical to sensitive tissue in the eyes or mouth. Caution should be used during application because DEET may degrade certain plastics and fabrics.

A newer chemical called Picaridin, or KBR 3023, is nearly odorless and better tolerated by people who have trouble using DEET, though it is just as effective at simi-

Oil of Lemon Eucalyptus is comparable to DEET at low concentrations but should not be used on children under 3 years old because is has a strong sedating effect and has been associated with many adverse effects in young children.

Products containing Permethrin are available for treating physical barriers like clothing, shoes, tents, and bed nets. Permethrin should not be applied directly to the skin.

If prevention fails, bites may be treated with hydrocortisone cream or calamine lotion to ease the itch. Experts from the Mayo Clinic describe a homemade topical paste that can be made by mixing equal parts water and powdered meat tenderizer. Another old dermatology trick is to apply very warm water (hot enough to feel uncomfortable but not hot enough to burn the skin) to the bite for a few seconds. Some people find the opposite approach works better and recommend applying ice to the affected area to reduce inflammation.

Stronger reactions can be treated with an antihistamine like diphenhydramine (Benadryl), chlorpheniramine maleate (Chlor-Trimeton, Actifed), loratadine (Claritin) or cetirizine (Zyrtec).

It is not a bad idea to stock the cabin or camp first aid kit with one or more of these treatments. Preventing, or when necessary, properly treating the common mosquito bite will make summer-life more enjoyable for everyone.

Saying it Sincerely

Pastor Mike Christian, River of Life Assembly of God for the Nome Ministerial Society

"You are more precious than the lilies!"

God knows where you are and what you're going through! There are times when we feel all alone. Times when we feel as though even our best friend has forsaken us, left us to deal with our problems or difficulties all by ourselves. These moments can be overwhelming to say the least. However, we must understand and know that there is always someone to turn to when we find ourselves in circumstances or situations that seem to be beyond our control. We can turn to Jesus!

God sent his son, Jesus to this earth to provide salvation for us from our sins. His desire for each and every person on this planet is that they be saved and cleansed by the blood of Jesus. Once we enter into a personal relationship with Jesus, we become his people, his children. In that relationship, we now have the opportunity and privilege of receiving all that he has for us. His healing, his deliverance and his provision are ours as needed. All he asks is that we love and serve him with all our hearts, our minds, our souls and our strength. Whereas he came to this earth and died for us, is this not a most reasonable request from him? If you and I have received such a wonderful gift as the salvation of God through the blood of his only son, then shouldn't we be willing to love, trust and serve him all the days of our lives?

Jesus said in Luke 12, verses 27 through 31...

"Consider how the lilies grow. They do not labor or spin. Yet I tell you, not even Solomon in all his splendor was dressed like one of these. If that is how God clothes the grass of the field, which is here today, and tomorrow, is thrown into the fire, how much more will he clothe you? O you of little faith! And do not set your heart on what you will eat or drink; do not worry about it. For the pagan world runs after all such things, and your father knows that you need them. But seek his kingdom, and these things will be given you as well.

Once again, the Lord God is totally aware of where you are and what you're going through right at this very moment. I would encourage you today, if you are struggling, if you feel all alone; I want you to know that Jesus loves you and he is with you at this very moment. Regardless of the difficulty you may be experiencing, he wants you to know that he is there for you. All you need to do is call out his name, reach out to him and he will touch you, he will minister to you. The Lord promised his people:

'And surely I am with always, to the very end of the age.

Matthew 28:20b

May the blessings of the Lord be yours as you reach out to him with all your heart!

Molly Anigina Tocktoo

My beloved wife, Molly A. Tocktoo, died peacefully at the Norton Sound Regional Hospital in Nome, Alaska at 10 p.m. April 17 surrounded by family.

Molly was born to Alfred and Dolly Kiyutelluk at Shishmaref on December 23, 1925. She married Vincent Tocktoo, Sr. on May 14, 1950 in Shishmaref. Together, they had eight children, 25 grandchildren, 36 great-grandchildren, and 11 foster children from the surrounding villages of Wales, Brevig Mission and Teller. Molly and Vincent took very good care of all their children, including their grandchildren and great-grandchildren, nieces and nephews. She always encouraged her children to honor the Sabbath Day and attend regular church services. Molly had great faith in the Lord and prayed daily. They were to celebrate their 60th wedding anniversary May 14. She looked forward to celebrating it with her husband and family at the Commu-

Mom was vastly known fosewing garments for horn dolls carved by Dad, at statewide, nationwide and international levels. Together, they began making the horn dolls at the first year of their marriage for income and continued to make them as a supplement for household expenses. She was an avid seamstress, skin sewer, and tirelessly made parkas for all her family members. She never refused to offer her assistance to help make parkas for anyone in the village.

In her early years, she was appointed by the boat owners to sew walrus hides for the bow of the skin boats. They knew she had the talent to sew together the hides for this difficult task.

Mom was a traditional subsistence provider and gatherer for her family. She loved to prepare the oogruks at springtime and she had a passion for salmonberry picking during the summer, which was her favorite time of the season. Her favorite camping sites were at Inaugruk, Nasvarruk, and Igloo. Each summer, she was sure to travel to our camps.

In the early years, she was the first bilingual instructor and taught skin sewing of slippers, beaver hats, and mittens. She also taught her students to 'kupchuk' seals. She continued to share her sewing and subsistence skills for her family and friends until her last days. Her recent project was to teach local women to crimp hard soles for mukluks or slippers. She enjoyed this project very much and would often tell of the success of the program to others.

Molly assisted Vincent in the making of the Eskimo Pie commercial and the Alaska Discovery Film for ELCA. She also traveled with Dad to Greenland to represent the Bering Strait Region at ICC. She never forgot the experience of this trop and often would reminiscence whenever she saw any documentary of Greenland on TV. She was the first elected woman chairperson for the Elder's Advisory Committee and represented Shishmaref until she was not able to attend meetings. She was also elected Elder of the Year for the Bering Strait Regional Corporation and the Shishmaref Native Corporation. She also assisted BLM and her Native Allotments and set boundaries for them.

Mom enjoyed cooking her traditional Native food and especially baking bread, doughnuts and cinnamon rolls. She would cook and bake almost daily to feed her family and for anyone who visited her home.

Mom was looking forward to meeting all of her loved ones and was very restless her last few days. Mother was ready to leave this world and gave notice to her family. She is now at rest to see her family and friends in Heaven. We are so blessed to have had her an additional 27 years, health-wise

She is survived by her husband, Vincent Tocktoo, Sr., brothers Davis Kiyutelluk, Steven Kiyutelluk, Morris Kiyutelluk and sister Agnes Magby; children James Sinnok, Florina Snell, Darlene Turner, Karen Tocktoo, and Vincent Tocktoo, Jr.

She was preceded in death by parents Alfred and Dolly Kiyutelluk, children John Sinnok (twin brother of James), Kakaruk, Hannah Tocktoo, and Benny Wayne Tocktoo; brothers Clayton, Amos, and John Kivutelluk.

Dear Friends and Loved Ones,

Our son and beloved has gone! My son Richard Slwooko is no longer with us! I thank everyone who helped us. May the Creator of all bless you. Praise the Lord!

Sincerely yours, Grace Slwooko

To All the Supporters and Volunteers,

Richard Slwooko and family express a heart felt thank you to the Village people of Gambell, especially to Gambell I.R.A., Job and June Koonooka, Ellen Kulukhon and family, Joseph Slwooko and family, Quinn, Jeffrey, Nupokahak Family, Apatiki Family, David, Archie, Amos, Thomas, Chris, Alaska Airlines, Bering Air, Evergreen Memorial Chappel, and last but not least to the Volunteers at Hope, and Alaska Native Medical Center.

Crack opens for new state building site

By Sandra L. Medearis

The state Department of Administration issued a call statewide to contractors, developers or landlords for interest in providing about 60,000 square feet of office space in Nome. The state would consider a 20-year lease, a lease/purchase or the outright purchase of a new state office building to house its agencies.

The call, issued June 25 on a state Web site and published in this week's Nome Nugget on page 13, makes no promises to those who respond, but signals an opportunity for builders outside of Nome. No cost of the project is to be included in the letter of interest, and no award will be made, but the move could further clear the way for local owners to put together a piece of ground large enough to build the state building on Front Street. A scheme is afoot to consolidate privately owned properties downtown, including a large lot owned by Sitnasuak Native Corp., to provide a site.

A plan to erect the $40 million building north of town has stirred opposition from those having a stake in downtown rentals and Front Street businesses, including tourism. The state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities has done preliminary work on a site north of town belonging to Alaska Gold Co., including securing approval of a preliminary plat. Meanwhile, private landowners have been lobbying state agencies, seeking to erect the building on Front Street and lease space or sell the building back to the state.

Mitch Erickson, head of the Nome Chamber of Commerce, would like to see the ragged state building by the seawall replaced by another in the downtown area to avoid the desertion of the town's main street.

"This is a great opportunity for us," Erickson said, referring to the online request for letters of interest. "Now it's up to local business to take this opportunity."

If the state puts up the building, the project falls under purview of DOT&PF. However, the request for information/letters of interest came out of the governor's office, because lease arrangements fall under the Department of Administration, according to Matt Desalernos, ADOT&PF project director who has been doing preliminary work on the Alaska Gold Co. site north of Steadman. The state has favored that site for a building large enough to hold all the state agencies wanting to move as well as security for the justice system offices.

ommon Council approves $10.8 million budget

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome Common Council unanimously approved ordinances adopting all five FY 2011 budgets for the City of Nome at a regular meeting on Monday. No one offered comments during the public hearing preceding the vote.

The FY 2011 general fund municipal budget totals $10.8 million, $9.1 million of which are revenues obtainable from sources other than a municipal property tax. The ordinance levies 7 mills on $242.1 million worth of taxable property within the city to raise $1.7 million in property tax revenues. The city's 5 percent general sales tax collections are expected to add revenues of $4.6 million, and a fund balance appropriation will contribute $1.7 million.

Revenues anticipated from dozens of other sources in FY 2011 include landfill mainte-

Melted runway means travel woes

Reduced air service can leave Little Diomede residents stranded on both sides of the strait

By Tyler Rhodes

When Becky Kunayak left home in late May, she was able to catch a plane. But when it came time for Kunayak to try and get back, a flight home was no longer an option.

The runway had melted. "I've been away from home for almost a month now, and I have seven kids at home," she said from Nome in mid-June. "They're missing me. I'm missing them.

Kunayak's home is on Little Diomede Island, a village that is about as remote as one can get in a state that is full of hard-to-reach places. In many winters, the sea ice that clings to the island's steep coast also serves as a runway. There is no suitable spot on the island for a plane to land.

When the ice goes out, the village is left to rely on helicopter service for the transportation of mail, goods and, previously, people. While a helicopter still travels weekly to Diomede when weather permits, village residents are generally no longer comprise part of the payload.

The inevitable loss of the ice runway puts the village back in the transporta-

Worth Keeping

Two hundred and thirty four years ago a group of British citizens gathered at a town hall in Philadelphia and put their names, their money and their futures on the line. These were brave and thoughtful men who not only had a vision, but they also had the courage of their convictions. They were liberal thinkers with dreams of a democracy. They sought to build a nation based on a strong foundation where leaders were elected by the citizens and the leaders held themselves responsible to the voices of the people. Leaders were elected by the people, and they listened to the people. A grand concept indeed.

Now let's fast-forward to 2010 and any small town in grass roots America. Imagine Ben Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, John Hancock, John and Sam Adams and the rest of the Independence Hall boys walking down Fifth Avenue to attend a Nome Board of Education meeting. What would they think when they heard, "Trust us we have compelling reasons," but declined to state the reasons. Would they recognize, "This is democracy in action," to mean, "You elected me by a democratic process, and now I can do anything I have on my hidden agenda?" Ol' T.J. would probably say, "What the heck happened in the course of human events?" John Hancock would have probably picked up his quill pen and said, "These folks don't even follow their Democracy has its roots in America's small towns, in local city councils, school boards, utility boards, county commissioners and township councils. Progressive, community-minded leaders and board members are being replaced by termites who attack the foundations of democracy and promote their self-interests. The ordinary citizen has to realize the fragile nature of democracy and put obstructionists out of office. - N.L.M.

Alaska politicians welcome lifting of drilling moratorium

Gov. Sean Parnell and the Alaska congressional delegation were pleased with U.S. District Court Judge Martin Feldman's ruling last week that the Obama administration's moratorium on offshore drilling was arbitrarily imposed. Parnell called the ruling good for the nation and said he hopes that the ruling "sends a clear message to federal agencies to grant the permits that Shell will need to drill in the Outer Continental Shelf in 2011." U.S. Sen. Mark Begich said the Louisiana judge's ruling overturning the ban on deepwater offshore oil and gas development showed that the moratorium was overreaching. Begich said that lifting the ban "hopefully will get responsible exploratory drilling planned by Shell in Alaska's Arctic waters back on track soon."

The decision came in response to a lawsuit filed by Hornbeck Offshore Services, a company that provides services to oil rigs. Judge Feldman wrote in his findings that the government had failed to provide enough specific findings on the risks of deepwater drilling to justify a blanket moratorium. Only 33 of more than 3,600 deepwater drill rigs were affected by the government's moratorium. The Center for Biological Diversity plans to appeal the decision, saying that the judge's decision to lift the moratorium trades oil industry profits for the safety of offshore workers, the long-term health of the Gulf Coast economy and the environment.

Postal service proposes to drop Saturday deliveries

The U.S. Postal Service put out a proposal to change their workweek to a Monday through Friday schedule, dropping Saturday mail delivery. The Postal Regulatory Commission is currently holding seven field hearings across the nation, none of them scheduled for Alaska. Just like the Nome Nugget, other newspapers across the country are relying on the postal service for delivery. The five-day proposal comes in light of the postal service's continued losses. The five-day plan would cut street delivery and blue-box collections on Saturdays. Express Mail service would continue seven days a week. Post offices currently open on Saturday would remain open and would deliver mail to P.O. boxes. Bulk mail and drop shipments would continue to be accepted at facilities that are currently open. If the plan were to be implemented, the estimated annual savings for the post office would be $3.1 billion. It would take an act of Congress to change the postal delivery to only five days a week as the existing statutory language mandates mail delivery six days a week.

Gov. Parnell signs bills

Gov. Sean Parnell last week signed Senate Bill 312, legislation that reduces the cruise passenger head tax from $46 per head to $34.50. The cruise ship tax was used to help communities impacted by large-scale tourism to pay for necessary infrastructure improvements. The Alaska Cruise Association sued the state over the imposition of the tax, which was approved via ballot measures by Alaska voters. Parnell made a deal with the association to reduce the tax and in return, the Alaska Cruise Association would drop its lawsuit against the state.

Parnell also signed House Bill 344. which extends the deadline for salmon processors in Alaska to receive a salmon product development tax credit. The program allows applicants to claim a credit on their annual fisheries business tax for 50 percent of the purchase costs of eligible equipment. Under current law, processors can claim the credit for the property first placed into service by Dec. 31, 2011. This bill would extend the program's sunset date to Dec. 31, 2015, allowing processors more time to continue their long-range investment planning. The salmon product development tax credit was a key recommendation of the Joint Legislative Salmon Industry Task Force.

EPA regulates mercury air emissions in gold mines

The Environmental Protection Agency proposed a rule under the Clean Air Act to limit mercury air emissions from gold mines. This rule is going to affect the Donlin Creek Mine project, a joint venture between NovaGold Resources and Barrick Gold. According to the Northern Alaska Environmental Center, mercury associated with the gold ore at the proposed Donlin Creek Mine could release significant amounts of mercury during the mining and milling process. Under the proposed EPA rule the mine could be permitted to emit over 3,200 pounds of mercury per year. In comparison, the EPA's annual toxic release report stated that in 2008, 71 pounds of mercury were emitted in Alaska that year.

Alaskans reappointed to federal fish council

Last week, U.S. Commerce Secretary Gary Locke reappointed Alaska commercial fisherman Sam Cotten of Eagle River and Kodiak salmon fisherman Duncan Fields to seats on the North Pacific Fishery Management Council. The council is a federal agency helping to oversee management of Alaska's fisheries. Three months ago, Gov. Parnell forwarded his nominations for consideration by the commerce secretary. Cotten's seat was up in August, Parnell nominated Fields of Kodiak and James Hubbard of Seward. The governor nominated Cotten as an alternate. Support letters from the Aleutian East Borough and residents led to Cotton's reappointment.

Redistricting underway

Following the census of the United States, the Alaska State House and Senate are reapportioned. Boundaries for legislative districts are redrawn to make populations as equal in number as practicable while taking into account geography and socio-economic ties among communities. A five-member board carries out the task of redrawing district boundaries, and Gov. Parnell appointed Albert Clough of Juneau and John Torgerson of Soldotna to the Redistricting Board. Senate President Gary Stevens, R-Kodiak, has appointed Robert "Bob" Brodie of Kodiak. Brodie is a former mayor of the City of Kodiak. The remaining members of the board will be appointed by Speaker of the House Mike Chenault, R-Nikiski, and Walter Carpeneti, Chief Justice of $104,274; and Nome Recreation Center (fees, rentals, bowling, classes, food and vending machine sales), $192,200.

The general fund budget summarizes expenses for FY 2011 as follows: Legislative, $200,842; administrative $798,135; city clerk, $416,962; police, $1.9 million; animal control, $74,818; fire, $346,776; ambulance, $198,535; public works, $2.6 million; Recreation Center, 750,985; Nome School Pool, 143,073; Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum, $222,320; Kegoayah Kozga Library, $215,561; visitor information, $142,672; and non-departmental, $2.7 million.

The largest non-departmental expenses in the FY 2011 budget are the Nome Public Schools 4 mill mandate appropriation of $1 million, plus an extra contribution to NPS of $791,674. In addition, a transfer to the school bond fund of contributions to debt service on various school bonds totals $586,763. Relatively small allocations include $10,000 for the Iditarod Trail Committee support; $10,000 to the Nome Community Center Food Bank; $30,000, Nome pre-School; $15,000, Nome Sportsman's Association; and $10,000, Nome Emergency Shelter Team.

The four other FY 2011 City of Nome budgets approved by the council are the capital project fund budget for $3.4 million, the special revenue fund budget for $207,403, the Port of Nome budget for $1.3 million, and the construction capital funds budget for $2.9 million.

Council adopts resolutions

The council unanimously adopted a resolution establishing the National Incident Management System (NMIS) for the City of Nome as the local standard for management of routine and catastrophic emergencies. President Barrack Obama has directed the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security to develop and administer an NMIS to provide a consistent nationwide approach for federal, state, local and tribal governments to work together more effectively and efficiently to prevent, prepare for, respond to and recover from domestic incidents, regardless of their cause, size or complexity.

The resolution notes that the NMIS Incident Command System components already are an integral part of various incident management activities throughout the community, as required by the City of Nome Emergency Operations Plan. In response to a question from Councilwoman Mary Knodel, Police Chief John Papasodora said the city needs to be consistent with the NIMS to qualify for certain funds.

The council unanimously took the following actions by resolution:

• Awarded a contract to Nome Machine Works for the repair and maintenance of light duty vehicles and emergency services vehicles. Nome Machine Works bid $80 an hour to perform the work, $75 for call-out plus $2.50 per mile for wrecker service, and a 25 percent parts markup. Nome Machine Works did not submit a bid for repair and maintenance of heavy duty vehicles. The contract is for one year with a one-year renewal option upon agreement of both parties.

• Awarded a contract for heavy duty vehicle equipment repair and maintenance to Q Trucking, which bid $70 an hour for work on heavy duty vehicles, $25 for call-out plus $3 a mile for wrecker service, and a 25 percent parts mark up. Q Trucking did not submit a bid to repair and maintain emergency services vehicles and light duty vehicles. The contract is for one year with a one-year renewal option upon agreement of both parties.

 Authorized City Manager Josie Bahnke to enter into an agreement with John Johns for professional services to (1) perform a sales tax audit on Steven Longley, dba E-Z Enterprises, and conduct an assessment of the potential benefits of implementing a comprehensive sales tax auditing program in the City of Nome for a cost not to exceed $4,800; and (2) help the city implement a comprehensive sales tax auditing program for $120 an hour upon authorization and prior written approval by the city manager.

Knodel asked City Clerk Sandy Sturgis-Babcock to ask the city attorney to determine whether ordinances allow the city to pull the licenses of those who don't pay sales taxes. Sturgis-Babcock said she would ask the city attorney how to tighten applicable ordinances.

The council voiced no objection to a transfer of liquor license from Twin Dragon Restaurant to Twin Dragon, Inc. Sturgis-Babcock explained that the state requires the city to approve a liquor license transfer (called a restaurant designation permit) when a restaurant with a liquor license changes its name.

Utility manager's report

Nome Joint Utility Manager John Handeland said the utility has built overhead power lines to the new hospital under construction on the Nome Bypass Road, adding that work to provide water and sewer services for the hospital is ongoing. He said he appreciates the public's patience with the closures on Sixth and Seventh Avenues and K Street, and predicted they will be open by July 4.

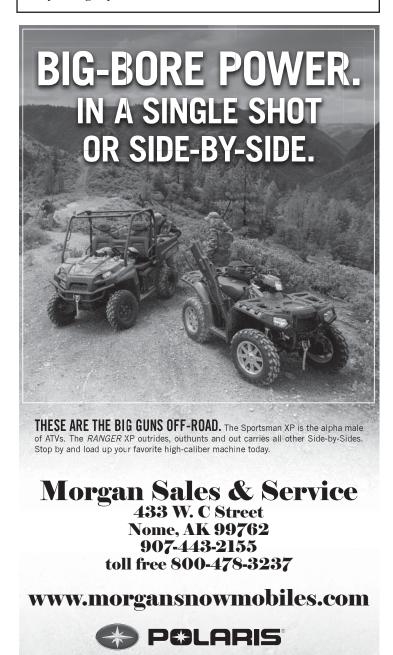

The council agreed to Handeland's request to include him in an executive session to discuss property matters. The primary purpose of the executive session held immediately following the regular council meeting was to discuss Sturgis-Babcock's employment contract.

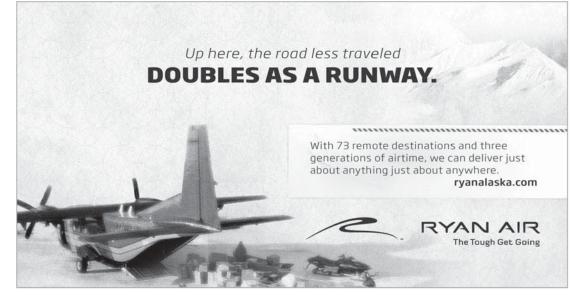

All council members attended the meeting. Mayor Denise Michels and City Manager Josie Bahnke were absent.

Tax break provision for CDQ groups dies in Senate

By Laurie McNicholas

Last week Senate Republicans killed H.R. 4213, the Obama administration's broad economic stimulus package.

The bill would have extended unemployment insurance benefits for the jobless, delivered new aid to states, extended the life of numerous tax credits for individuals and businesses, and closed some tax loopholes. Dying with the bill was a proposed amendment seeking tax-exempt status for income from some business activities of the six entities in the Western Alaska Community Development Quota Program. Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the CDQ program.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski submitted the proposed amendment (SA 4367, co-sponsored by Sen. Mark Begich). Bob Walsh, Murkowski's field representative in Anchorage said Murkowski intends to follow up the proposed amendment with a freestanding bill.

On June 24 the Senate rejected a motion by Majority Leader Sen. Harry Reid to close further debate on a revised version of H.R. 4213. The revised bill lopped $22 billion from its price tag, reported Donny Shaw at the OpenCongress website.

Reid had moved to close debate to overcome a filibuster of the bill. Sixty votes are required to pass a cloture motion. The yea-nay vote was 57-41. Sen. Mark Begich and all other Democrats voted for cloture except Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, who voted nay, and the late Sen. Robert Byrd of Virginia, who did not vote. Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, an Independent, supported the motion. All Republicans voted against the motion except for Murkowski, who did not vote. A week earlier, Democrats had failed to achieve the 60 votes needed to pass a cloture motion on a different revision of H.R. 4213 that also substantially reduced the deficit impact of the measure.

Proposed CDQ amendment

Titled "Western Alaska Community Development Organization Tax Relief Act," the proposed Amendment 4367 to H.R. 4213 as published in the Congressional Record includes the following provisions.

All income derived from a trade or business carried on by a CDQ entity identified in the Magnuson-Stevens Act participating or investing in the harvesting, processing, transportation, sales or marketing of fish and fish product in the Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands (BSAI) Fisheries Management Area would be excluded from taxation if the conduct of such trade or business is in furtherance of one or more of the purposes specified for CDO entities in the Magnuson-Stevens Act. Such excluded income received after the date of enactment of the proposed legislation would be reported by each CDO on the annual return required under section 6033 and in any annual report required under the Magnuson-Stevens Act. The effective date would apply to income received before, on, or after the date of enactment of the proposed legislation.

If the assets of a trade or business of any subsidiary wholly owned by a CDQ entity are transferred to the CDQ entity no later than 18 months after the date of enactment of the proposed legislation, no gain resulting from the transfer would be recognized to either the subsidiary or the CDQ entity and all income derived by the subsidiary from the transferred trade or business would be exempt from taxation.

Amendment 4367 includes the following findings. The CDQ Program was created in 1992 when the U.S. Secretary of Commerce approved Amendment 18 to the BSAI Fishery Management Plan to promote the economic development of 65 villages in western Alaska that were organized as six coalitions.

In 1994 the Joint Federal-State

Commission on Policies and Programs Affecting Alaska Natives recommended to Congress that it amend the Magnuson-Stevens Act to codify the CDQ Program and expand it to include all commercial fisheries conducted in the BSAI management area.

In 1996 Congress enacted section 305(i)(1) of the Magnuson-Stevens Act which established the CDQ Program to give the 65 member communities the opportunity to participate and invest in BSAI fisheries, to support economic development in western Alaska, to alleviate poverty and provide economic and social benefits for its residents, and to achieve sustainable and diversified local economies in the region.

The six CDQ companies are recognized as tax-exempt under either section 501(c)(3) or section 501(c)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986. The companies are using the revenues that their participation in BSAI fisheries generates to create employment and economic development opportunities that would have been impossible in western Alaska prior to the CDQ program.

Taxable income questions

The CDQ program receives up to 10.7 percent of the annual total allowable catch of BSAI fish and crab harvests. The CDQ companies do not pay income tax on royalties from CDO fisheries because the companies have nonprofit, tax-exempt status under the internal revenue code. However, as the companies have accumulated wealth and invested in factory trawling companies and processing plants, concerns have arisen that income from some of their investments may be subject to IRS taxation as unrelated business income - income not substantially related to the purposes of their nonprofit, tax-exempt status.

In 2007 NSEDC determined that income from some of its investments is taxable as unrelated business income. The company paid $8.1 million in back taxes, interest and penalties for the years 2005 through 2007, and about $3 million in 2008 to the IRS. NSEDC established a wholly owned for-profit subsidiary, Siu Alaska Corp., to hold its taxable assets. Several other CDQ companies took the position that their income from Bering Sea investments was substantially related to their exempt purpose and was non-taxable.

In 2008 the six companies generated nearly $190 million in revenue and had combined assets of $427.6 million, according to a Western Alaska Community Development Association report.

Last year Sens. Murkowski and Begich submitted legislative proposals from NSEDC and five other CDQ companies for an exemption from U.S. tax under 501(a) of the IRC to the Joint Committee on Taxation. NSEDC submitted a supplement to the proposal of the other five CDQs. NSEDC's supplemental language provided for a retroaceffective date for the legislation to allow for a refund of taxes the company paid on some of its income, and a provision for transferring the assets of CDQ subsidiaries back to their parent companies. The JTC is a nonpartisan Congressional committee composed of five members of the Senate Committee on Finance and five members from the House Committee on Ways and Means. The committee staff prepares official revenue estimates of all tax legislation considered by the Congress.

Lost government revenues

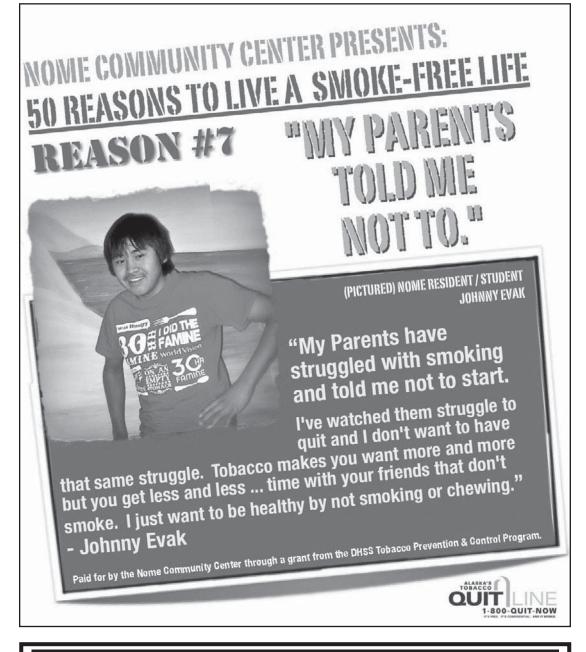

Thomas Barthold, the JTC chief of staff, informed the senators in a letter dated Oct. 21, 2009 that some of the activities included in the CDQ legislative proposals could be found to be taxable under current law. Barthold's letter includes a table showing revenue estimates the government would forego in a 10-year period for the proposal that included the supplemental language submitted by NSEDC ($124 million) and for the proposal without the supplemental language ($92 million). The supplemental language that NSEDC submitted is included in Amendment 4367.

Barthold said the government may forego additional future revenues if the legislative proposals are enacted. "Furthermore, it is possible that the entities might expand their newly tax-exempt activities beyond current levels," he noted. "To the extent that these entities compete with taxable entities, reducing taxable entities' profits, your proposal would indirectly reduce revenue from these taxable entities.

"Including the supplemental language, taxable subsidiaries wholly owned by CDQ entities could seek refunds and would pay less tax in subsequent years, until their assets are transferred back to the CDQ entities," Barthold continued. "Moreover, the supplemental language regarding the effective date results in a combination of refunds for previously paid tax and less collection of unpaid tax from previous years."

Commercial crab, subsistence salmon fishing open

Laurie McNicholas

Norton Sound's summer king crab fishery began at noon Monday when the Alaska Department of Fish and Game opened the Community Development Quota portion of the fishery at the request of Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.

This year's guideline harvest level is 400,000 pounds of red king crab with a carapace width of more than 4.75 inches. Thirty thousand pounds of the harvest (7.5 percent) is allocated by law to the CDQ fishery.

Two crab buyers are registered for the open access king crab fishery, Norton Sound Seafood Products in Nome and Aquatech in Anchorage, reports Jim Menard, ADF&G area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue. He said the open access fishery with a 370,000 pound quota will begin when a buyer so requests, probably in the first week of July.

Meanwhile, many Norton Sound residents are enjoying their first tastes of fresh salmon this season. Menard said subsistence salmon fishing is underway in the Unalakleet, Shaktoolik and Nome subdistricts. The schedule for subsistence fishing with set gillnets in the Nome subdistrict is from 6 p.m. Thursday to 6 p.m. Sunday in marine waters. In fresh water subsistence fishing is open from 6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Wednesday, and from 6 p.m. Thursday to 6 p.m. Saturday. No seining or drift gillnetting is allowed.

Subsistence salmon fishing in the Shaktoolik subdistrict is open in marine waters from 6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Wednesday, and from 6 p.m. Thursday to 6 p.m. Saturday. In the Unalakleet subdistrict the subsistence salmon fishing schedule in marine waters is 6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Wednesday, and from 6 p.m. Thursday to 6 p.m. Saturday. For the Unalakleet River drainage the schedule is 8 a.m. Monday to 8 p.m. Tuesday, and from 8 a.m. Friday to 8 p.m. Saturday.

While some are catching salmon, others are counting them. Menard reports that salmon escapement counting projects have begun at the new Unalakleet River weir, at the tower on the North River, a Unalakleet River tributary, and at the Kwiniuk River tower in the Elim subdistrict. The ADF&G Unalakleet River test net is catching salmon.

Salmon counting is to begin this week at the Niukluk River tower in the Golovin sub-district, and at weirs on the Eldorado, Nome and Snake rivers in the Nome subdistrict. Counting began last weekend at Glacial Lake weir in the Nome subdistrict and will begin this week at the Pilgrim River weir in the Port Clarence district. Menard thanks NSEDC for assistance in Norton Sound's salmon escapement counting projects.

Commercial fishing is expected to begin July 10 in the Kotzebue district, and Great Pacific is the buyer, Menard said.

the Alaska Supreme Court. Legislative elections under the new district boundaries will begin in 2012.

State's first sexual assault response coordinator named

Gov. Parnell appointed Katie TePas to be the state's first domestic violence and sexual assault response coordinator. The Legislature created the position in the governor's office as part of a comprehensive initiative against sexual assault and domestic violence. TePas, of Anchorage, is a program coordinator for the Alaska State Troopers, where she manages statewide programs and services specific to domestic violence, sexual assault, child sexual abuse and stalking. TePas' new role is to give direction to all relevant executive branch agencies and to collaborate with municipal, federal, tribal and nonprofit entities to reduce the rates of sexual assault and domestic violence.

Icebreaker Polar Sea out of commission

The U.S. Coast Guard last week announced that the icebreaker Polar Sea, the nation's only functioning heavy icebreaker, is out of the water until at least January 2011 due to engine problems. The Coast Guard has had to cancel a scheduled fall 2010 Arctic patrol and likely will have to cancel other missions through January 2011. The Coast Guard said a recent inspection of the Polar Sea's main diesel engines revealed excessive wear in 33 cylinder assemblies. The Polar Sea's sister ship, the Polar Star, is also in dry dock as it undergoes repairs. It won't be back in the water until 2013. This leaves he icebreaker Healy, which is primarily used to support scientific research, the only U.S. icebreaker in action.

VPSO programs boosted

A law that passed through the U.S. Senate last week gives rise to hope that Alaska's Village Public Safety Officer programs may get federal funds. The Tribal Law and Order Act passed the Senate and is on its way to the House of Representatives. The new law would allow federal grants to help pay for village public safety officers in rural Alaska. Currently, villages and other advocates for increased rural public safety must go through the state Legislature or congressional earmark process to get funding. The legislation, passed the Senate by unanimous consent, would improve law enforcement and the justice system on Indian reservations in the Lower 48. Alaska Sen. Lisa Murkowski inserted language to include VPSO funding.

Alaska higher education task force formed

Alaska Senate President Gary Stevens (R-Kodiak) has named Sen. Kevin Meyer, R-Anchorage, to be chair of the joint legislative Higher Education Scholarship Funding Task Force. This task force will give recommendations to the next Legislature on the creation of a complete package of merit- and needsbased, academic and vocational training scholarships for Alaska's youth.

tion limbo it experienced last summer when Evergreen Helicopters of Alaska began using a different model of helicopter to fulfill its contract to deliver mail. The shift prompted Evergreen to no longer offer passengers service. Before last July, when space allowed, seats were available for purchase to those looking to travel between the mainland and the island.

Tired of being stuck in Nome—and with plane and helicopter rides out of the question—Kunayak took the last remaining option to get home, a boat. After trying to get home for nearly a month, Kunayak finally hopped on a plane from Nome to the village of Wales on the western tip of the Seward Peninsula. From Wales she caught a boat piloted by relatives for the roughly 27-mile trip back home June 16.

Kunayak had left Diomede May 20 to have her tonsils removed in Anchorage. Once back in Nome, but unable to get to Diomede, she spent her time visiting friends and relatives in town and staying at Norton Sound Health Corp.'s patient hostel. "It's been kind of day by day," she said while still in Nome.

The hardest part for Kunayak was the separation from her children. "There were times I would talk to them, and I would try to not let them know I was crying. Because if I'm crying, then they might start crying," she said.

The situation has left people stranded on both sides of the Bering Strait. The same need to get home that prompted Kunayak to chance a boat crossing to Diomede prompted others to do the same in the opposite direction. The boat that brought Kunayak to Diomede first delivered teacher Willis Ferenbaugh to the mainland June 16. The next day, as Ferenbaugh was preparing to board the Alaska Airlines jet to leave Nome, he talked about how his fellow teachers narrowly made it off the island on one of the last plane flights of the season. He said his co-workers essentially ran from the school to the runway as soon as their teaching year came to a close.

Two days later the icy landing strip was no longer fit for planes and Ferenbaugh was still on the island.

The teachers' haste to get out while they could was understandable. Their trip to get to Little Diomede for the school year was anything but easy. With no passenger helicopter service last August, the teachers hitched a ride on the crab boat, Inaliq, from Nome to Little Diomede. Rough weather made the trip anything but easy, keeping the school's teaching staff on board for approximately 30 hours before making it to shore. Much of that time was spent anchored just offshore from the island. With no large boat dock and rough seas preventing a landing, the teachers ultimately had to unload their wares, and themselves, into a small skiff piloted by village residents to finally get to shore.

The narrow stretch of the Bering Sea that divides the island from the mainland is notorious for its weather and potentially deadly seas. Village residents have perished in the past trying to make the journey by water. Ferenbaugh said the boat drivers proceeded cautiously as they motored away from the island June 16, scrutinizing the conditions while a quick retreat was still possible. Two boats safely made the journey that day.

Subsidized travel sought

Forces have been at work to regularly provide seats on the mail flights since the practice stopped last year. Leading the charge has been Kawerak Inc., the regional tribal consortium. Kawerak President Loretta Bullard sent a letter to Gov. Sean Parnell in mid-June pressing the state to pony up funds to help subsidize flights through the federal government's Essential Air Service program.

According to Bullard's letter, the federal program could provide a 50 percent subsidy for the flights, leaving the state responsible the other half. Bullard's letter said a contract was signed between Evergreen and the Essential Air Service in January that would have had Evergreen provide weekly service for a cost of $372,765 or twice weekly service for $649,344. Those subsidy amounts would be split between the state and the federal program, with each paying $186,383 for the weekly service or $324,672 for twice weekly flights. Bullard estimated that a ticket from Diomede to Nome would still cost $640, even with the subsidy in place. The state has not signed on to the contract.

There are grants available that could fully fund the subsidy, however, efforts to apply have been stalled as Diomede struggled to fill city council seats to approve resolutions, and the state and Kawerak go back and forth over who should do the leg work to apply for the grant.

Kawerak has asked that the state in the short term provide the $186,383 subsidy. The organization also asked that the state apply for the grant to fully fund the subsidy on behalf of Diomede. The grant could cover up to three years of full payment of the subsidy. For the long-term, Kawerak asks that the state join with Alaska's congressional delegation to amend the Essential Air Service's list to include Diomede at the 100 percent subsidy rate. The list of eligible communities to receive the full rate has not changed since 1978 and requires an act of Congress to be expanded.

Frustrating and frightening

The lack of regular air transport between the island and mainland has ramifications that range from frustrating to frightening. For Kunayak, it meant a long delay in getting home and her son missing a dentist appointment because he couldn't get off the island. But the isolation can have much more dire consequences. In November, brisk helicopter service flooded the island over the span of three days as Alaska Army National Guard Black Hawk helicopters ferried medical personnel from Nome-based Norton Sound Health Corp. to the village and evacuated a handful of residents to Nome due to severe flu-like symptoms.

The large-scale response came as the H1N1, or swine flu, scare was sweeping the state and nation. Nearly 100 people on the island were vaccinated and approximately 40 received anti-viral drugs to combat the flu. The community's health aides were overwhelmed with the cases by the time the state responded and sent in the cavalry. "We either try and get a Black Hawk out there or try and get people on a boat, which can be dangerous at times," said Norton Sound Health Corp.'s Roy Agloinga. "It's an impossible situation that has very high potential for disaster."

While the flu scare had the potential to devastate a large portion of the community of approximately 120, Kunayak worries about incidents that could occur on a smaller scale with advanced medical care being potentially out of reach. "It makes me worried about my family," she said. "I teach my kids to be more careful outside."

That is not to say Diomede does not have any medical care. The clinic on the island is locally managed. It was recently staffed by a mid-level provider, who just finished out her term in Diomede, and two health aides. One of the health aides is now out for maternity leave and another was to return to the island after being in Nome for training.

Home has its hardships

Despite her desire to get home and be reunited with her family, Kunayak expressed a few reservations about heading back. "It's hard to go to where it's so hard to get medical care and groceries, and prices are going up out there," she said. "I have a big family. They're charging $7 for a big load of wash. I was already $80 to $100 a week on laundry—and that when I was working." Kunayak works for the Bering Strait School District when school is in session. When school stops, so do her paychecks.

Residents of Diomede largely rely on subsistence to survive. Those who do not face high prices for groceries that can be in low supply when weather or other elements keep the helicopter from arriving. "It's hard on families who don't do subsistence—not to the point of famine, but it's hard on people," teacher Ferenbaugh said.

But the lifestyle, and even the isolation, that come with living in Diomede are also draws for Kunayak. "It's beautiful out there. We are provided with natural resources. We're provided from the sea when we go hunting out there. We have clean air."

Researchers forecast continuing decline of sea ice

By Diana Haecker

German researchers with the Alfred Wegener Institute for Polar and Marine Research in Bremerhaven and the University of Hamburg gave grim projections in the sea ice outlook for 2010 and the future.

The KlimaCampus research group in Hamburg came up with the forecast that the 2010 polar sea ice would melt down to cover only 1.8 million square miles. Their colleagues with the Alfred Wegener Institute project a slightly bigger sea ice extent of 2 million square miles. Neither of the two research groups anticipate that this year's ice melt will be as dramatic as the all-time low sea ice minimum record of 1.7 million square miles set in the summer of 2007. But still, they say, the multi-year sea ice is not bound to recover.

Currently, the Arctic sea ice covers an area of 3.8 million square miles. According to the National Snow and Ice Data Center, Arctic air temperatures remained above average, and sea ice extent declined at a rapid pace in May. At the end of the month, the extent of the sea ice fell near the level recorded in 2006, the lowest in the satellite record for the end of May. The rate of ice extent decline for the month was a loss of 26,000 square miles per day. This rate of loss, scientists say, is the highest for the month of May during the satellite record.

Researchers at the University of Washington suggest that ice volume has continued to decline compared to recent years. This week's sea ice for walrus outlook report by the Study of Environmental Arctic Change says that shore-fast ice at Wales and Shishmaref show signs of breakup. Large portions of the fast ice are moving slowly northward. Very little ice, if any, is present west of Wales.

The sea ice report says that the waters around St. Lawrence Island are becoming virtually sea-ice free except for some floes off the eastern end of the island. The concentration is less than 20 percent and the floes are generally very small. All the last ice in the Gulf of Anadyr is gone. There is still persistent shore fast ice present along the northeastern coast of the island, east of Savoonga.

Although the German researchers conclude that 2010 won't be a record setting minimum sea ice year, they assume a long-term decrease in sea ice cover for the northern polar region in the summers of the coming decades even though 2008 and 2009 saw an upward trend in sea ice extent.

In the recent edition of the magazine Science, researchers with the Alfred Wegener Institute published a study that natural methane concentrations caused a global warming trend 40,000 years ago. Methane trapped in the ocean floor was abruptly released, causing temporary warming of the planet. However, they warn, this is not comparable to today's situation. The researchers say that human-caused releases of methane and carbon dioxide are the impetus for the global warming trend the earth is experiencing now.

Millrock Resources starts drilling in Council

Canadian exploration company Millrock Resources Inc. began their exploratory drilling season in Council. Millrock and their joint venture partner Kinross Gold Corp. launched their $800,000 exploration program and intend to conduct 8,200 feet of reverse circulation drilling to test for hardrock gold deposits. Millrock has an agreement with the State of Alaska to pay 500 ounces of gold bullion in annual installments and a minimum $250,000 in exploration expenditures. A second agreement exists with the Bering Straits Native Corp. concerning leasehold rights Millrock acquired for the Council project and include exploration expenditures, cash payments and royalties.

Mary Pete appointed to Arctic Research Commission

President Obama last week appointed Mary Ciuniq Pete of Bethel to serve as a commissioner of the U.S. Arctic Research Commission. Pete is currently director of the Bethel-based Kuskokwim Campus of the University of Alaska. For nine years she was the director of the Division of Subsistence in the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. Pete was born in Stebbins, holds bachelor's and master's degrees in anthropology from the University of Alaska Fairbanks and speaks Central Yup'ik Eskimo. Pete was appointed to the "indigenous" slot on the commission for a three-year term. She replaces Vera Kingeekuk Metcalf of Nome, whose term had expired. The commission was created in 1984 to establish and promote national policy on the Arctic, advise the Congress and national administration on Arctic policy and provide guidance to federal agencies about better coordinating Arctic policy and the needs of northern people.

Mackey, Owens to run 2011 Iditarod

Among the 46 mushers who signed up May 26 for the 2011 Iditarod Trail sled dog race were reigning champion Lance Mackey, five-time champ Rick Swenson, former champions Martin Buser and Mitch Seavey, and last year's runnerup Hans Gatt, Sebastian Schnuelle and Nome's Melissa Owens. Absent was Jeff King, who had announced he would take a break. The Iditarod also had board elections, and new to the board are DeeDee Jonrowe's husband, Mike Jonrowe; John Baker's brother, Andy Baker; and Danny Seybert. The new board president is Mark Moderow of Anchorage. Zoya DeNur and Ramey Smyth were the winners of the annual drawing to have their $4,000 entry fee waived.

Iron Dog has new executive director

The Iron Dog board of directors last week selected Kevin Kastner as the new executive director of the race that dubs itself the longest and toughest snowmachine race. Kastner fills the job after the dismissal of former executive director Laura Bedard in May. The annual race runs from Big Lake to Nome and then from Nome to Fairbanks.

State building

The request for information/letter of interest asks for a statement of the size of a proposed building within a 3.5-mile radius of the post office on Front Street, in ADA compliance, with the parking plan for visitors and employees spelled out, the relation of the location to flood zones, and when the building would be ready to receive state agency offices. Additionally, the project must be within 250 feet of the existing public road and utility system. The Alaska Gold Co. site also falls within these parameters.

Is the issue whether the project will put money in the pockets of NovaGold, parent company of Alaska Gold Co., Alaska Native corporations Sitnasuak and Bering Straits, or other private landowners on Front Street?

Who knows?, Desalernos said Monday. The governor's office has opened up possibilities. The Department of Administration's request for letters of interest was to appear in the Anchorage Daily News. Someone outside the region could step in with an idea and money to back it, he said.

Nonetheless, Desalernos emphasized, state procurement code would be followed, providing a regulated competition and ruling out a sole source transaction. Letters of interest would be kept on file pending a possible, but not promised, request for proposals per state procurement law. No award would be made based on the June 25 request.

"It's testing the water to see if there is any interest out there," he said. "This is nonbinding on any party. We don't really know what is out there. There may be another group.'

If a package deal large enough to accommodate the building needed could be put together and purchased by the City of Nome, the state could deal directly with the municipality without the competitive process, but would also take the project off the property tax list and necessitate a smaller building or multiple stories.

Still, "that would be the most feasible way to get anything into the downtown area," Desalernos said.

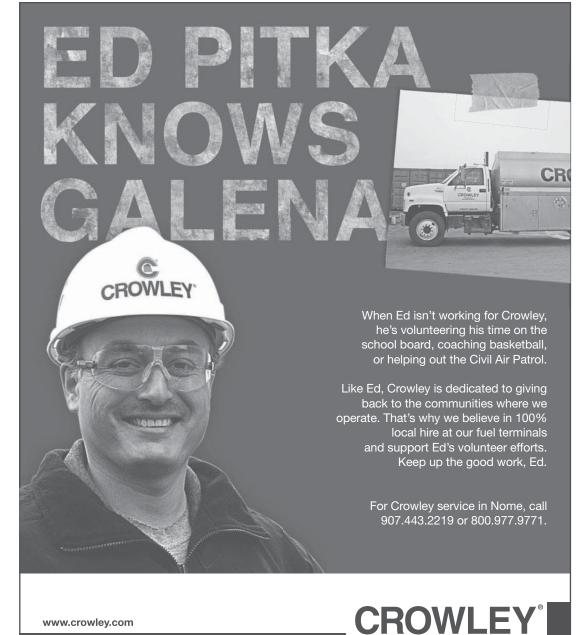

Meanwhile, a state project to build the office space is "in limbo, on holding mode," he said. "We've done all we can do with the design. We've assessed client needs and desired grouping of agencies. We can go no further without knowing where it will be built."

Erickson of the Chamber of Commerce said Monday that while office space might be cheaper to rent in the state-built building, charging rent to state agencies would cancel that offset of the $40 million construction cost, and would not account for the cost of lost opportunity to spend that money to meet more pressing needs.

Don't get him wrong—"But we do want and need a building. We're just saying 'you chose a lousy place for it," he said, citing increased traffic congestion at the Steadman site.

Monday there was little reaction to harvest from those active in the building site debate. Mayor Denise Michels and Sitnasuak CEO Trudy Sobocienski were out of town. Nikolai Ivanoff of Alaska Gold Co. did not immediately return a message. John Handeland of the utilities office and Nome Common Council members did not know of the state request.

Salmon: Superfood of the sea with health benefits

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Salmon are arriving back into the region. Soon fish racks and smoke houses will add their scents to the welcome aromas of summer, and our freezers will be restocked with many varieties of salmon, arguably the world's healthiest meat.

Though it is easy for people in northwestern Alaska to take the presence of wild salmon in the summer for granted, the American Heart Association (AHA) and the American Diabetes Association (ADA) would say we are fortunate to have access to such healthy food. These organizations recommend fatty fish like salmon for the prevention of serious disease and the promotion of overall health.

Wild salmon provides an excellent source of protein. Salmon contains nearly the same amount of protein per serving as red meats with only half the amount of total fat and only a quarter of the amount of heart-clogging saturated fats.

Salmon provides a natural source of healthy polyunsaturated fats called omega-3 fatty acids. Two forms of omega-3 fatty acids are found in salmon: docosashexaenoic acid (DHA) and eicosapentaenoic acid (EPA). Research shows that consumption of DHA and EPA reduces the risk of heart attack, heart arrhythmias and stroke. In northwestern Alaska, the Genetics of Coronary Artery Disease in Alaska Natives (GOCODAN) has shown that a diet rich in foods like salmon, which are high in omega-3 fatty acids, are associated with lower triglycerides and LDL (bad cholesterol) and a higher HDL (good cholesterol).

Salmon may also help people with autoimmune diseases. The omega-3 fatty acids found in salmon are known to have anti-inflammatory effects that reduce symptoms and the need for extra medication in people with rheumatoid arthritis, ulcerative colitis, psoriasis, Crohn's disease and lupus erythematosus.

In recent years, salmon has been highlighted as an important source of vitamin D3. People who live in the far north are at risk of vitamin D deficiency because dark winters and poor UVB radiation penetration of sunlight at northern latitudes inhibits the synthesis of vitamin D in the skin. Vitamin D deficiency has been associated with an increased risk for heart disease, osteoporosis, type I diabetes mellitus, certain cancers, multiple sclerosis, rheumatoid arthritis and susceptibility to infectious disease.

Regular consumption of salmon can prevent vitamin D deficiency. One 3.5 oz serving of salmon contains between 600 to 1,000 units of vitamin D3. Experts recommend 400 to 1,000 units of vitamin D3 daily for children over age 1, and 800 to 1,000 units of vitamin D3 daily from all sources for otherwise healthy adults.

Wild salmon also provides essential minerals like selenium and vitamin E, antioxidants that help detoxify the body of waste products and improve the immune system, and may also protect against prostate cancer.

Some people are wary of possible toxins found in salmon. Various studies show that salmon meat contains low levels of mercury and polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) that once ingested can remain in the body for years. This concerns some nutritionists who discourage the consumption of fatty fish, especially in pregnant women and young children. However, the extent to which these toxins cause disease in people who eat salmon regularly is unknown, and all experts agree that population subgroups, like rural Alaskans, who once relied exclusively on a salmon-rich diet suffer negative consequences in overall nutrition if they decrease their intake of marine foods.

THE NOME NUGGET

Therefore, the American Heart Association states that the risk of not eating salmon far outweighs any risk from accumulating toxins from eating fish. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) currecommends limiting salmon consumption to 12 ounces (three to four servings) of fish weekly for pregnant women and children. Generally, adults may safely consume 14 ounces or more of salmon weekly.

Salmon is one of the healthiest meats in the world. This readily available superfood from the sea provides excellent health benefits to the people of northwestern Alaska. So let's go fishing.

"Enjoying the Sun, Rejoicing in the Son"

The beautiful and long days of summer are here. The sun shines bright even past midnight. Temperatures rise. The tundra comes alive with vegetation, the fish and the birds return, and our spirits soar. The lethargy of winter gives way to boundless energy. Folk fests, parades, summer picnics and polar bear swims signify an endless variety of ways to share our joy within the community. This past week with a lot less fanfare, we celebrated the birth of John the Baptist. John, the cousin of Jesus, was born six months ahead of Jesus. You may recall from the Gospel of Luke that after Mary learned that her cousin Elizabeth was pregnant, she set out in haste to the hill country of Judah to assist her elderly cousin with the pregnancy. Reginald Thomas Tungwenuk

Obituary

Reginald Thomas Tungwenuk The late Reginald Thomas Tungwenuk was born on August 14, 1952 at Teller, Alaska to Mildred Seelkoke and Gerald Oxereok, then later adopted by Thomas and Alma Tungwenuk. Siblings include Betty (Dusty) Nicholson, Bruce Tungwenuk, Lillian (Beah) Katongan, Thomas Tungwenuk Jr. Regs' good confidant Elaine Kingeekuk, Karen Baxter (Floyd Crumbley) and Theresa Queen-Phillips and James Kevin McKinney.

He was a 1973 graduate of Mt. Edgecumbe High School, then joined the US Marines. He lived in many coastal villages with his parents who were pastors. More recently he lived in Seattle and Anchorage.

In his younger years he enjoyed dog teaming, berry picking, fishing, moose, seal, and walrus hunting. He was a very hard worker for his family and the communities that his parents served with the Covenant Church.

He worked at the Norton Sound Health Corporation as a Security Aide. Reggie was a member of the Alaska Native Lutheran Church. He loved to make us laugh by making a variety of funny faces just to hear laughter. He was a person who helped homeless people feel at home in his house; making sure they ate his marvelous beef soup or his sourdough pancakes, as well as other meals he served. When in Nome he loved to beach comb, be with family and friends and pick blackberries. He loved to being out in the country at various camp sites. He will be truly missed by one and all.

He is survived by biological mother Mildred Queen, siblings Betty Nicholson, Bruce Tungwenuk, Lillian (Beah) Katongan, Thomas Tungwenuk Jr. (Elaine Kingeekuk) Karen Baxter (Floyd Crumbley), Theresa Queen-Phillips, James Kevin McKinney, numerous cousins, nieces, nephews, friends and family. He is proceeded in death by his parents Thomas and Alma Tungwenuk, brother Brian Tungwenuk and brother in-law Dusty Nicholson.

Thank You!

THANKS, THANKS, THANKS for the beautiful photographs of the luminarias...and to the photographers - great job...nice and clear and bright! And there aren't enough thanks to go around to the wonderful, dedicated, and caring group of people who pulled this off. Totally impressive! AND, as a former art teacher, I noticed the "bag art" immediately and was BLOWN AWAY! I wish there were a way to THANK each and every one of the artists and, if they aren't too old for such things, give them big hug! I was so honored to be included in what must have been a very spiritual event and I thank everyone who participated! You are doing God's work and making a difference! Becky Bunosky rived and greeted her cousin, the infant leaped in her womb. John the Baptist began his work of being a herald for Jesus well before his birth, and nearly nine months before the birth of Our Savior. John intuitively understood the psalmist's prayer, "from my mother's womb you are my strength; my hope in you never wavers." (Psalm 71:6)

"A man named John was sent from God. He came for testimony, to testify to the light, so that all might believe through him. He was not the light, but came to testify to the light. The true light, which enlightens everyone, was coming into the world." (John 1:6-9) Six months after John's birth, when our days are darkest and coldest, Jesus came into the world.

Our summers are short, and we should enjoy every second of the sun as it shines. But we should never forget that the Son is the real reason for our joy. The Son shines bright during the joys of summer and the extremities of winter. He gives meaning to our lives in moments of joy and sustains us when dark clouds take away our joy. From his truly boundless ability to forgive, we have the promise of an eternity filled with folk fests, parades, picnics, and the joys of community.

Like John the Baptist, we too are called to be heralds of the Good News. We may be past the point of leaping in the womb with joy, but we can still leap to give voice for the unborn, the oppressed, and the voices that are silenced by a world that all too often embraces the dark side. As an adult, John dealt more vocally with the dark side. He called people to repentance. "Make straight the way of the Lord." (John 1: 23) John did not come to trumpet his own horn but to point others to the Son of God.

As we enjoy sun of summer, let us remember that it to points to the glory of God. The summer sun fills us with joy; the Eternal Son fills us with life. Let us rejoice and be glad.

Chum and pinks strong, kings and sockeyes weak

By Laurie McNicholas

Early results from Norton Sound salmon escapement counting projects indicate that runs are coming in as expected-average to strong for pinks and in most of the region for chums, but weak for sockeyes and kings-reports Jim Menard, Alaska Department of Fish and Game area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue.

Commercial chum fishing is scheduled for all Norton Sound subdistricts except the Nome sub-

"They're slamming chums in Elim," Menard said of 14 commercial fishermen who caught 5,701 chums and 2,562 pinks in a 48-hour opener that ended July 2. Nets are restricted to 100 fathoms or less and gillnet mesh size is restricted to 6 inches or less stretched mesh.

The salmon escapement goals at the Kwiniuk River Tower in the Elim subdistrict are 300-550 kings, 11,500-23,000 chums and 8,400 pinks. A total of 37,937 chums and 140,000 pinks were reported past

School security camera proposal gets wary reception

Wehde says discussion is preliminary

By Tyler Rhodes

Describing its current video system as "one-legged" and "primitive," Nome Public Schools' Superintendent Jon Wehde wants the district to look into a more advanced surveil-

Wehde broached the subject at a Nome Board of Education work session held June 22, telling the board he wanted to investigate implementing closed-circuit cameras that would record footage which could later be reviewed. "The goal is to start looking at this as a big-picture topic as Nome Public Schools," Wehde said, noting that the technology is used at the neighboring Bering Strait and Northwest Arctic school districts. "They are heavily invested in this for all the right reasons,"

The proposal immediately caused board member Wilma Osborne, who was appointed to the board just minutes earlier, to bristle. "I don't like the idea of surveying children. I think that really changes how we feel

City seeks to save landmark White Alice from demolition

Letters -

Dear Editor,

The annual Nome celebration of Independence Day was so wonderful, sunny, and community oriented. Kudos to all who contributed to make it so!

Now, my rant. I'm so frustrated that I have to have three to five phone books on my counter to find numbers for people living in Nome! Yes, I know all about subscribers and all that but please, someone, put together a phone book which includes us all, regardless of which company we may have chosen as our carrier.

We have around 3,500 people here. What's so difficult about making a Nome phone book? Well, besides advertising money and all that. I'm upset when people here and out of town are telling me they've tried to call me but I'm "not in the phone book." In the latest one, I'm not there, neither is my spouse. Regardless of our professions and jobs, our home numbers have always been listed in the phone book!

It's such a waste of needed space to keep so many editions of past phone books on the counter. Yeah, yeah, I know...write the numbers I want in my own little/large black book. Well, sometimes, I want to call someone NOT in my book! And, even though I know that person has a phone, s/he is not listed in the most current version of whichever phone book sits on my counter, sometimes not even in 411 ("state the state, city, and party you wish to contact") socalled Information. And I have to pay between 75 cents to $1.50 to discover that person is not in the com-

White Alice Slated to Go

The familiar towers atop Nome's Anvil Mountain are to be torn down. The Air Force constructed these towers back in the 1950s as part of the old White Alice communication system that was set up during the Cold War to relay information dealing with coastal security. In two weeks the Sitnasuak Land Committee is set to tell the Air Force to tear them down before they are turned over to Sitnasuak. In past years the City of Nome has said it would assume liability for the historic towers but the land was never turned over to the city.

White Alice towers used to adorn the hills over many western Alaskan communities, but in recent years most have been forn down. One of the few remaining sets of towers is on Anvil Mountain. These relics of the 1950s, which look like giant drive-in movie screens, are part of our history. They have been around for about 60 years. Folks traveling the road system, flying our airways or sailing home on the seas know they are almost home when they see the Anvil Mountain towers loom onto the horizon. They are visual points of reference for hikers and travelers. We don't need a GPS, when we see White Alice we know where we are.

Once we tear down the towers they are gone. They are gone forever. A part of our town's history is gone. Part of our state and national history is relegated to memory and the museum archives. Let's save our White Alice towers. See the informational insert on page 9 of this issue and take action. - N.L.M.-

News from around the state

Parnell hire steps down

Former Eagle River legislator Nancy Dahlstrom resigned from her new job as the senior advisor for military affairs with the Parnell Administration. Alaska Governor Sean Parnell hired the former Representative for that position, but it became controversial when the department of law changed their opinion that the newly created position was in the spirit of the state's constitution. In Alaska, there is a Constitutional provision that prohibits a legislator from taking a position on which he or she might have voted while a member of the legislature.

State reaches settlement with Tesoro and Seabulk Tankers

Seabulk Tankers Inc. and Tesoro Alaska got off the hook when they reached a settlement of $429,870 with the State of Alaska's Department of Environmental Conservation. In February 2006, the tanker Seabulk Pride, under the charter of Tesoro, took on petroleum products from the Tesoro refinery in Nikiski. The tanker broke away from the Kenai Pipeline Co. dock during heavy ice conditions.

Its crew could not start its engine and it grounded off the East Forelands of the Kenai Peninsula. About 84 gallons of gasoline spilled into Cook Inlet and the grounding of the oil tanker on the beach threatened an oil spill as the tanker carried nearly five million gallons of oil. The tanker was loading oil in extreme ice conditions.

The state's investigations found that the crew failed to meet key requirements as there was no captain on the bridge, the engine room was unmanned and operations were not in a state of immediate readiness. With the settlement of the matter, the companies do not admit to any violations. The $429,870 settlement represents an oil spill civil assessment of $5,000, civil assessments of $360,000 based on Seabulk's economic savings in not complying with the crew and readiness requirements of Tesoro's oil spill contingency plan, and $64,870 in reimbursement of the state's response and investigation costs. Tesoro has agreed to produce a video at a cost of at least $35,000 to train mariners in Cook Inlet on ice hazards during winter operations.

Alaska Cruise Association drops lawsuit

The state held up its end of the bargain when legislators and Governor Sean Parnell budged and reduced the state's cruise ship passenger head tax. Last week, the Alaska Cruise Association officially terminated its lawsuit against the state's excise tax on cruise ship passengers. In a settlement agreement reached between the state and ACA in April, ACA agreed to dismiss its lawsuit if the governor signed into law a bill passed by the Legislature that reduced the commercial passenger excise tax from $46 per passenger to $34.50. Attorney General Dan Sullivan said that the issues in this case were factually and legally complicated, and that without the settlement, the case could have been tied up in federal court for years to come.

Anchorage Republican wants Alaska included in OCS leases

Last week, State House resources committee co-chairman Craig Johnson fired off a letter to the federal Mineral Management Service urging the service to include Alaska in the next five-year plan for outer-continental-shelf oil drilling leases. The Interior Department and the MMS are currently undertaking a preliminary environmental impact statement scoping process for the next five-year leasing program. Johnson argued that Alaska's OCS contains some of the country's last large, untapped reserves, with the potential for 27 billion barrels of recoverable oil and 130 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

Johnson compared Cook Inlet conditions with outer continental shelf conditions of the Beaufort and Chukchi Sea. He said that decades of experience in Cook Inlet have demonstrated that current technology exists to safely explore Alaska's vast OCS potential reserves.

The MMS last week awarded a grant in the amount of $125,000 to the State of Alaska for developing geographic response strategies for protecting critical areas in the event of an oil spill.

EPA regulates mercury emissions of gold mines

The Environmental Protection Agency recently proposed a rule under the Clean Air Act to limit mercury air emissions from gold mines. The Northern Center for the Environment said while the rule is a step in the right direction, it doesn't go far enough. They warn that the Donlin Creek Mine project, a joint venture between NovaGold Resources Inc. and Barrick Gold, could release significant amounts of mercury because of the mercury associated with the gold ore at the proposed mine. Under the proposed EPA rule, the mine could be permitted to emit over 3,200 pounds of mercury per year from ore pre-treatment processes and more from other parts of the milling operation. In comparison, only 71 pounds of mercury was emitted in Alaska in 2008, according to the EPA.

Indian Affairs official hears concerns of Alaska Natives

FAIRBANKS (AP)— The new assistant secretary for Indian Affairs told tribal leaders that calls to revisit the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act have gotten his attention. During a four-hour meeting in Fairbanks last week, Larry Echo Hawk listened to a host of concerns from Alaska Natives. Many speakers focused on weakened ties to ancestral lands and said it was time to revisit the 1971 law that settled aboriginal land claims by transferring 44 million acres of land to Native corporations.

A repeated theme at the gathering was that ANCSA disenfranchised a generation of Natives by excluding them as shareholders in Native corporations. Children born after Dec. 18, 1971, weren't directly granted shares under the provisions of the act, although federal law has since been modified to allow more flexibility for Native corporations to grant them to younger members. Even so, the ma-about our home where our kids are. I'm very wary about it," she said. "I think this is a serious discussion to have. We are a small school, it's not like an urban setting."

Wehde stressed that the subject was just being put on the table and a full discussion would ensue before any plan of implementation was proposed. "The question is, do we need this? Shall we look into it?" Wehde said. "This is just the opening dialogue." Wehde said, at the earliest, his intention would be to include a security system in the district budget for the 2011-2012 school year.

Wehde also said the cameras, if pursued, would not be used in areas that would violate students' privacy.

The district currently has three security cameras. Two are at the high school covering the entrance to the gym and the Nanook Room, while the third is located at the elementary school, covering the playground. Wehde does not believe the three cameras serve much of a purpose at the moment. "It probably provides a false sense of security," he said, later noting that he would prefer that the current cameras be taken down. "They have been in and out of service," he said.

Wehde said the elementary school camera was intended to cut down on bullying and vandalism in the playground area, especially in the summer months when school personnel are not nearby to monitor or intervene.

If the decision to install cameras did go forward, it would not come cheaply. Wehde said some preliminary bid work conducted in the past yielded an estimate of $10,000 for a single unit. Wehde said he would look to grants for financial support.

Wehde said as he researches security system options, a more detailed discussion and presentation would take place with the board.

TOWERS' DAYS MAY BE NUMBERED—Two of four White Alice tropospheric-scatter antennas, seen here at 1:30 a.m. Monday, stood vigilant 24 hours a day and seven days a week to warn of Soviet attack during the Cold War. The fate of this installation on Anvil Mountain may be demolition unless an agreeable solution to contaminants can be found.

ship, intends to decide the fate of the towers in two weeks. The White Alice site is on a U.S. Air Force list of Formerly Used Defense Sites the military is systematically cleaning up. Currently a fence surrounds the USAF-owned installation and equipment, as a cleanup of contaminants gets underway.

The Air Force has been working to cleanup the site and at the same time, to accommodate the wishes of the community," John Handeland said. Handeland, as the city's utility manager, has coordinated with the USAF on cleanup efforts near Port Road and is trying to help facilitate a solution along with the City of Nome. Before the land can transfer to Sitnasuak, it must pass through the federal Bureau of Land Management, the agency that sorts out claims in certain land disposals.

The BLM will not accept the site while it is contaminated, and that includes the towers whose back, flat USAF paying for cleanup, Sitnasuak might be left with annual maintenance costs to pass onto shareholders. Without a solution to keep them standing, the antennas block the land transfer to Sitnasuak, and what many see as a valuable historical heirloom could disappear. But the City of Nome does have something to offer to sweeten a deal: a licensed asbestos dump.

Alice has friends

Folks who want to keep the towers in view have scrambled over the past few weeks and through the July 4 holiday for alternatives to save the towers from demolition. Anvil Mountain White Alice installation is among the last few standing, from the horseand-buggy tropospheric-scatter communications system erected statewide in the 1950s during the Cold War. Antiquated now, the system brought "modern" communications to Alaska Bush villages for the first time. But now "scatter" may be clutter.

The City of Nome, in discussions with Sitnasuak, has been working on cleanup or disposal of the towers. The city has sent a questionnaire to the Air Force seeking costs for removal of the asbestos panels backing the towers including labor, equipment and freight on replacement parts.

We would like to determine how one-time costs associated with removal of asbestos panels and recovering with another permanent skin might compare to the $60,000 annual cost estimate by the USAF to keep the existing panels intact and coated [with a sealant] into the future," Handeland said.

"If the will of the people is that the towers should stay, there is a solution that could be developed," Handeland continued. "The Air Force has suggested they could remove the panels and leave the tower frames, but that would lead to eventual rusting out. The ideal would be to remove and replace the panels. The city has a state DEC-approved asbestos disposal cell at the landfill. In cooperation with the city disposing of the asbestos, the Air Force could free up the cost of taking down the panels and disposthat money for new panels acceptable to BLM and Sitnasuak.'

The demolition itself would be expensive, similar to the cost of several millions to dismantle the White Alice towers at Big Mountain in southern Alaska, according to a 2004 USAF environmental newsletter.

Paranoia?

The Anvil Mountain White Alice site is one in a chain of communication components, including installations at Tin City and St. Lawrence Island, set up around the state from 1955 to 1958 using the principle that signals could travel between farflung sites by going up and bouncing down from a layer of atmosphere, the troposphere, to the next station, even below the horizon. Thus the technology got the name "Forward Propagation Atmospheric Scatter," "Tropo" for short.

In nontechnical language, that was a radio relay communications system where telephone and telegraph signals were amplified and sent onto the next point. Picked up and sent along by antennas like those on Nome's Anvil Mountain, the signals could travel static-free across rugged and vast terrain without hindrance by weather conditions. At ribbon-cutting day, 23 of the 33 original stations used the new technology. As years passed, the White Alice system became a part of a larger web of 71 communication sites. Most of the White Alice stations had staff, with many sites in rugged remote locales along the coast and interior spanning the state from the Aleutian Islands to Barrow.

pened decades before the border along the Bering Strait opened in 1988 and Nome people started visiting and marrying their Russian neighbors.

When it went into operation, the system improved civilian communications that had allowed only one person at a time to call from Nome to Fairbanks, a number of telecommunications historians say, long before Nomeites began to check the time in Provideniya and telephone Russian friends across the Strait.

"If the will of the people is that the towers should stay, there is a solution that could be developed."

- John Handeland

The system "was to help guard the roof of North America," according to the souvenir booklet issued on dedication day-"to come under the Alaska Air Command as part of its three-fold mission: to provide expeditious warning to the United States of aggressive attack, to defend Alaska and all its holdings in the air, and to be used by the military to warn of incoming air attacks and to provide a launching platform for Strategic Air Command aircraft." Alaska had once belonged to Russia, and Nome's Anvil Mountain, after all, was only 160 miles from Siberia. Geographical location fed suspicion of possible attacks.

Thus, Anvil Mountain White Alice helped to provide communication with the Distant Early Warning Line and tie together 30 Aircraft Control and Warning Stations under the control of Alaska Air Command. All this hap-

Cost overrides

The federal Army Corps of Engineers surveyed each White Alice site and built some of them, before the job went to Western Electric. Initial estimates put the cost at $30 million, but the first phase had a cost override of $80 million and a later phase to extend the network toward the Aleutians, Operation Stretchout, pushed the cost over $300 million. According to telecommunications historians, Western Electric had under-estimated the cost of maintenance, penciling in six people and one 25kw generator when experience required 20 people and 120kw to 180kw of power to run a site. Sites in remote terrain required airport construction, diesel generators and fuel tanks flown in plus housing for technicians.

Sites generally had four, 60-foot curved antennas that looked like old drive-in movie screens set in two pairs facing opposite directions, coming and going, so that if a signal missed one, it had a chance to be picked up by the other and sent on. Many sites also had 30-foot microwave dishes.

Work on the White Alice system began in 1955 and lasted three years, using 3,500 workers, according to material passed out at its dedication at Elmendorf Air Force Base on March 26, 1958. The first link was up the following year; the first message went out Nov. 29, 1956.

As fear of aircraft attacks from the Soviet Union transformed to fear of Soviet missile attacks, the White Alice system hooked up to the Ballistic Missile Early Warning System. The "tropo" system grew southward from Boswell Bay through Southeast Alaska to Annette Island and down the Aleutian Islands to Shemya, while the whole system continued to be operated by the White Alice administration, according to a history on a Web site networking women employed in the White Alice and associated systems.

Old ways, old days

In the late 1960s, communication satellites started to beam down a "good-bye" to White Alice. Advancement in satellite communication started shutting down White Alice stations in the mid-1970s. By the end of that decade, it was all over for Alice; by the late 1970s, most of the sites had been decommissioned and demolished, according to Air Force documents. The only link left sent signals from Boswell Bay to Nek Lake.

Although it was a military system, during the entire 20-year life of White Alice, it was operated and maintained by civilian contractor personnel; first by Federal Electric Co., then RCA Service Co. and, finally, by ITT Arctic Services, according to several first-hand accounts.

Next week: Civilians who worked in the remote communication system remember good days and bad while the fate of Anvil Mountain White Alice icons may become clearer.

the tower through July 5. Menard said the chum count is the highest for that date in the tower's 46-year history. More than 1 million pinks have been counted at the tower in every even-numbered year since 2002, Menard noted. The Alaska Department of Fish and Game operates the tower with assistance from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp.

The Golovin subdistrict catch from a 48-hour commercial chum salmon fishing period that ended July 1 is confidential because only two permit holders fished, but the catch per unit of effort was a record, Menard said. Commercial fishing in the Norton Bay subdistrict opened for a 24-hour period on July 5. Nets are restricted to 100 fathoms or less and gillnet mesh size is restricted to 6 inches or less stretched mesh in the Golovin and Norton Bay subdistricts.

Unalakleet subdistrict

In the southern portion of the Unalakleet subdistrict, 19 permit holders caught 18 king salmon, 2,223 chums and 3,182 pinks in a 24-hour commercial fishing opening that ended July 3. "The catches are good, but it's hard to make comparisons because this is the first time we have tried fishing only half of the subdistrict," Menard noted.

A decline in abundance of Unalakleet River king salmon in recent years has resulted in the collapse of the commercial king salmon fishery and a decline in subsistence harvests. The subsistence salmon fishing schedule in the Unalakleet subdistrict allows for two 48-hour openings each week in marine waters and two 24hours openings each week in the Unalakleet River drainage. Beginning July 5, subsistence salmon fishing in the Unalakleet River drainage was limited to 6 inches or less stretched mesh gillnets.

The Unalakleet River test fish site reported catches of 19 kings, 338 chums and 127 pinks through July 2. "Historically the third quarter point for king test net catches is July 7," Menard said. "The king catch is only one-third of the recent five-year average and less than one-half of the recent 10-year average for this date.

"The chum catch has been above average," he continued. "The 2010 catch is nearly double the record 2008 catch for this date and slightly below the second highest catch in 2009 for this date. The pink catch is lagging well behind for an even year."

The Alaska Department of Fish and Game operates the test fish project with assistance from NSEDC.

The North River tower on a tributary of the Unalakleet River reported cumulative counts of 48 kings, 900 chums and 2,328 pinks through July 2. The escapement goal for kings is 1,200-2,600 past the North River tower. Menard said the kings are about one-third of the recent five-year average and one-quarter of the recent 10-year average, chum passage ranks second highest, and pinks rank second lowest for an even year on July 2. The tower is a cooperative project of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game and NSEDC.

A floating weir was installed on the Unalakleet River this year to obtain reliable estimates of the abundance and age, sex and length composition of king salmon spawning escapement on the Unalakleet River. A total of 58 kings, 6,027 chums and 36,771 pinks were counted at the weir as of July 2.

The Office of Subsistence Management, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, granted $620,931 to the Alaska Department of Fish and Game and the Native Village of Unalakleet for a four-year project to install and operate the weir. The Bureau of Land Management and NSEDC contributed to the project. The Unalakleet Native Corp. provided facilities for weir construction and a land lease for the weir campsite along the river. Scott Kent, assistant manager of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game Arctic region, is principal investigator for the project.

Shaktoolik subdistrict

The first 24-hour commercial fishing period of the season opened July 3 in the Shaktoolik subdistrict. Nineteen permit holders caught 7,342 chums and 3,726 pinks. Nets are restricted to 100 fathoms or less and gillnet mesh size is restricted to 6 inches or less stretched mesh. Subsistence salmon fishing is conducted in marine waters for two 48-hour periods per week.

Nome subdistrict

Subsistence set gillnet fishing is scheduled from 6 p.m. July 6 until 6 p.m. July 11 in marine waters. The fresh water subsistence area schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday, and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday.

Beach seining was allowed in the Eldorado, Flambeau and Sinuk rivers and the western end of Safety Sound from west of the Safety Sound Bridge from 6 p.m. July 5 until 6 p.m. July 7.

Aerial surveyors have noted good numbers of chum and pink in the lower reaches of many Nome subdistrict rivers. The Alaska Department of Fish and Game has begun to operate weirs on the Eldorado, Nome and Snake rivers and at Glacial Lake in cooperation with NSEDC.

UNALAKLEET RIVER WEIR—This 300-foot floating salmon weir was installed on the Unalakleet River in June. A decline in the abundance of Unalakleet River king salmon in recent years has resulted in the collapse of the commercial king salmon fishery and a decline in subsistence harvests. The Office of Subsistence Management, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, granted $620,931 to the Alaska Department of Fish and Game and the Native Village of Unalakleet for a four-year project to install and operate the weir.

eye at the Glacial Lake weir was 57 fish through July 2, an improvement compared to last year when only five sockeye were counted by that date, but well below the record runs of 2004 and 2005 when more than 4,200 and 6,000 sockeyes, respectively, were counted by July 2. The Glacial Lake weir escapement goal (aerial survey) is 800-1,600 sockeye.

Port Clarence District

Only two sockeye salmon were counted at the Pilgrim River weir through July 2. The escapement goal at the weir is 4,000-8,000 sockeyes (aerial survey at Salmon Lake and Grand Central, tributary to Salmon Lake). The Alaska Department of Fish and Game forecasted a poor sockeye run for the Pilgrim River compared to the runs from 2003 to 2008, and the department plans to close the Pilgrim River to all net fishing this week unless sockeye salmon passage improves, Menard said. The weir is a cooperative project of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game and NSEDC.

Red king crab fishery

The Norton Sound open access commercial king crab fishery began July 1 with a 370,000-pound quota. The Community Development Quota crab fishery opened three days earlier with a catch allocation of 30,000 pounds. Approximately 14,500 pounds of CDQ crab had been harvested through July 5, Menard reports. He said NSEDC has designated Norton Sound Seafood Products in Nome as buyer for the CDQ crab catch.

NSSP and Aquatech in Anchorage are registered buyers for the open-access crab fishery. Nineteen fishermen are registered for the open-access fishery and eight fishermen are registered for the CDQ crab fishery, Menard said. Six crabbers are registered as catcher-sellers.

jority of Alaska Natives are not shareholders. Lincoln

Bean Sr. of Kake described them Monday as the "forgotten children," lacking tribal land or financial clout. Barrow resident Charles Etok Edwardsen called the act a "rotten real estate transaction" and said Natives should contest it in an international court. In other testimony, speakers complained about the growing difficulty in living a subsistence lifestyle, including requirements that Natives buy duck stamps or stand in line for moose permits. Echo Hawk said testimony from the tour would be taken into consideration as the Obama administration crafts its policy on Native issues.

Inuit Circumpolar Council concludes with Nuuk declaration

The weeklong general assembly of the Inuit Circumpolar Council concluded last week with the so-called Nuuk declaration. One of the more consequential directives given in the declaration are the marching orders for the executive director to plan and facilitate an Inuit leaders' summit on resource development in order to forge a common Inuit position on how impact assessments should be undertaken in the Arctic. Other mandates included the implementation of the Circumpolar Inuit Declaration on Sovereignty in the Arctic, protecting and promoting Inuit rights and way of life internationally, advancing Inuit health issues and working toward the elimination of contaminants coming to the Arctic. The assembly also called on Arctic states to restate their commitment to the Arctic Council as the central forum for international Arctic decision-making. Almost 70 ICC delegates from Russia, Canada, Alaska and Greenland debated issues ranging from resource development in the Arctic, the role of Inuit in Arctic governance, circumpolar health, the Inuit language, consequences of increased shipping in the Arctic, economic development and environmental issues. Greenlander Aqqaluk Lynge was elected ICC Chair for the next four years. The 2014 ICC assembly will be held in Canada.

The fate of the active couch potato

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

You may want to read this article standing up.

Most people know that exercise is good for them. Scientists are now finding that excess inactivity, even if people exercise regularly, may increase the risk for serious disease.

According to the National Health and Nutrition Examination survey, children and adults in the United States spend 55 percent of their waking-day in sedentary pursuits like watching TV, working at a desk, using a computer, riding in a car, surfing the Internet, or eating at a table.

Even for people who exercise regularly, an increasing amount of data suggests that "sitting-time" has a profound effect on whether or not a person will develop diseases like diabetes mellitus, cardiovascular disease, impaired glucose tolerance (pre-diabetes), obesity, and certain cancers.

An interesting study out of Canada published in May of 2009 in the journal Medicine & Science in Sports & Exercise, followed over 17,000 people ages 18-90 over a 12-year period and compared their mortality rates (risk of death) based on how much sitting-time they averaged daily. The researchers found what they call a dose-response. The more time a person spent sitting throughout the day, the higher their risk of death. Those who spent half their waking-day seated were 11 percent more likely to die from any cause compared with people who sat rarely or up to one-quarter of the time. However, those who spent almost all their time in behaviors that require prolonged sitting were 54 percent more likely to die of any cause. This means that the more you sit during waking hours, the higher your risk of death. It emphasizes the fact that the human body is made to move.

There is now good evidence that exercise leads to substantial health benefits. The American Heart Association recommends at least 150 minutes of moderate-to-vigorous physical activity every week.

But this level of activity may not overcome the harmful effects of sedentary habits. For example, a study out of Australia published in 2008 followed over 4,000 people who regularly got the recommended amount of exercise weekly and found a dose-response between the amount of time spent watching the television and the development of metabolic symptoms like increased waist circumference, higher blood pressure, higher fasting glucose, and elevated LDL cholectorel

Scientists are now turning their eye toward the physiology of sitting still in an attempt to understand why sedentary people, even those who get regular exercise, develop certain health problems.

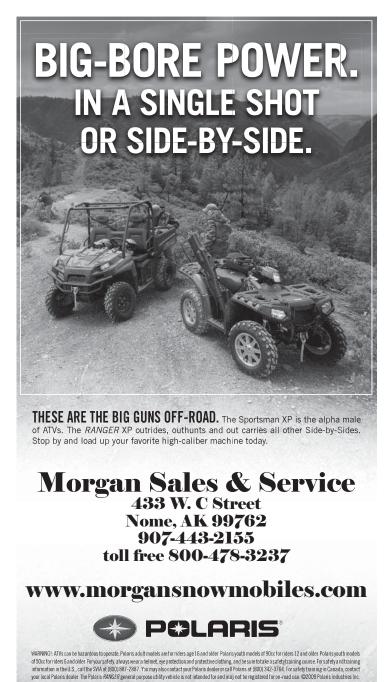

The best research we have so far comes from rats. When allowed to exercise, rats develop elevated levels of a special enzyme called Lipoprotein Lipase (LPL). This enzyme breaks down harmful fats in the blood stream and allows them to be safely absorbed into muscles and other tissues of the body. Sedentary rats have lower levels of LPL. Therefore the harmful substances build up in their blood stream leading to metabolic dysfunction, atherosclerosis, and cardiovascular disease. Interestingly, if rats are allowed to engage in "non-exercise" activity (the equivalent of walking to work) they produce nearly the same amount of LPL in the bloodstream as rats engaged in vigorous exercise. Experts say this means that muscle activity of any kind, not just strenuous exercise, plays a role in keeping us healthy.

In the Middle Ages, scholars identified inactivity as one of man's seven deadly sins. "Sloth," as they called it, was seen as one of the biggest threats to spiritual, mental, and physical health. Modern scholars not only agree; in addition, they are finding biochemical causes of illness in people who are sedentary. Perhaps this research will lead to the development of a new medication for people who are forced into a sedentary life by a disabling illness like multiple sclerosis or an injury like a spinal cord injury.

But for those who have the ability to move, a less expensive prescription is already available: simply find ways to move throughout the day. A few ideas include walking to work, standing at work, and walking to the store, post office, or bank. Also, taking the stairs, fishing, chopping wood, hunting, cutting fish, and gardening offer healthy benefits.

Experts tell us that physical activity throughout the day, not just strenuous exercise, is important for overall health, and the more we do to reduce sedentary time, and especially sitting-time, the more likely we are to avoid serious disease.

A decision is slated to be made this month that will determine the fate of the White Alice towers. The Air Force may be requested to remove these landmarks. They served as the community's link to the outside world and played a role in national defense. Today they provide a location for amateur communications repeaters. Many travelers in the area use them as a navigation aid/reference point for land, sea and air travel. Tourists, residents and muskoxen visit the site often.

Anna "Natiqaq" Etageak

Anna Etageak, 89, was born to Savetilik and Grace (Sakak) Savetilik on July 15, 1920 at Egavik, Alaska. She died June 24 at her home in Unalakleet, just shy of her 90th birthday. She married Joseph Etageak on Sept. 15, 1936 at the Unalakleet Covenant Church.

She was raised at Egavik and moved to Unalakleet in 1936. She raised her children at Qugaaqhaq until 1948. Anna, Joseph and her children would stay with Grandpa and Grandma Etageak in Unalakleet until they settled and built a house so her children could go to school. Together Anna and Joseph enjoyed dog mushing and going squirrel hunting, moose hunting, visiting the hot springs, fishing and trapping. Her hobbies were knitting, embroidering, beading and skin sewing, of which she was known for her beautiful mukluks. Yearly, she would make something to donate for the Woman's Sewing Circle Auction. She enjoyed doing subsistence activities like fall fishing at Harold's Slough and way up at Siqsruagayagaq (above John Auliye's), berry picking and boating with her 15horsepower motor. She loved to ice fish, from early fall, throughout the cold winter to late spring. Her life was a reflection of her livelihood; always busy and occupied with the year-round subsistence activities. Although she did not grow up learning to read, she memorized songs at church and sang them from her heart. She was grateful for the prayers she received and how God had answered her many prayers. She is survived by her children Theresa Nanouk, Betsy Pleasant, Lawrence Etageak and wife Delia, and Richard "Dicky" Etageak. She is survived by her 23 grandchildren, 35 great-grandchildren and seven great-greatgrandchildren, along with numerous nieces and nephews.

Anna was the last survivor of the Savetilik family. She was preceded in death by her parents Savetilik and Grace Sakak; husband Joseph Etageak; son Donald Etageak; daughters Ida Grace, Alice Anagick, and Ada Wilson; grandson Donald Etageak; granddaughters Rebecca Nanouk, Heather Wilson; great-grandson Michael James Greene; sisters Rebecca Katchatag, Ruth Pitmatalik, Gladys Traversie, Florence Sarren; brothers Nils Savetilik, Johnny Savetilik, and Dan Savetilik

Anna has left us with big shoes to fill; she was a role model in her lifestyle as an Inupiat Eskimo woman, widow and a strong believer in God. She has, and always will, be an inspiration to many.

The 33rd Annual Anvil Mountain Run took place on the 4th of July, Nome's 111th Celebration of the Fourth of July, with 14 participants ranging in age from 12 to 55 years. All completed the 12.5 Mile Course. The course runs from Nome City Hall to the top of Anvil Mountain, an elevation of 1,134 feet, returning back to sea level at Nome City Hall. The event has been continuously sponsored by Rasmussen's Music Mart, owners Leo and Erna Rasmussen, and the event is now the 2nd longest continuous running event in Alaska right behind the Mount Marathon in Seward. The course record was set by Mark Rogers in 1988 at 1 hour, 11 minutes and 23 seconds holds the top three course times; 2nd - 1985 at 1 hour, 11 minutes, 24 seconds; 3rd - 1984 at 1 hour, 11 minutes, 33 seconds. He Won his first Anvil Mountain Run in 1982, only competing four times of record. Runner Teddy Payenna at 17-years, who had been training to beat that record this year while wearing a 35-pound vest was only able to break into the Top Ten times with his 1 hour 17 minutes and 59 second 1st place 2010 finish. Four Judges were involved former Nome Mayors Leo B. Rasmussen and John Handeland, who have been involved for all 33 vears. Charles Lean who has been involved for 20 years and Sharon Keeney who has supported her husband, who holds the record by a mile for the most continuous completions of the Anvil Mountain Run he has run in 26 and is still completing the AMR in under 2 hours.

Council backs Sitnasuak state building project

By Sandra L. Medearis

People who park their ATVs on the vacant lot across from the Board of Trade Saloon downtown may have to putt-putt to a stop elsewhere.

The State Department of Administration issued a call statewide for letters of interest to provide land for a new state building in Nome after Sitnasuak and local business people panned the state's selected site on Alaska Gold Co. land at the north end of Steadman location would rob Sitnasuak's existing Front Street building of state rentals, reduce

By Laurie McNicholas

The Nome museum and library commission will recommend purchasing lots on Front Street between the Pioneer building and the National Guard Armory for the Richard Foster Building to house the Carrie M. McClain Memorial Museum, John Handeland told the Nome Common Council at a meeting on Monday.

The City of Nome has received nearly $2 million in state funds for the Richard Foster Building. Hande-

The celebration was held on a sunny and breezy afternoon at the Port of Nome's small boat harbor. Officials from the port, the City of Nome, Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and the Nome Volunteer Fire Department all gathered to toast the event.

The 28x10-foot Munson aluminum boat will be used for search-and-rescue operations, oil spill response and general work duty around the Port of Nome. Powerful and steady enough to motor far off shore yet nimble and light enough to navigate through the small boat harbor, the new vessel is a versatile tool for the port. The boat can travel at 40 knots and has draft of 18 inches. The $184,000 craft was built by Munson Aluminum Boats in Burlington, Wash.

More than half of the tab for the new boat was picked up by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. (NSEDC) through its outside entity funding program for fisheries-related projects. NSEDC provided $102,000

Nome's east end soon to see roadwork

By Tyler Rhodes
The old joke about Alaska having two seasons—those of winter and construction—is about to ring a little more true in Nome in the coming weeks.

Spurred by more than $3 million in federal stimulus funds, several streets on Nome's east side are going to receive either a new coat of asphalt or gravel, along with other improvements. Work is expected to begin toward the end of July. Contractor Twin Peaks Construction, based out of Anchor Point, will perform the work that is to take place on Fifth Avenue; G, H and K streets; and the Nome Bypass Road.

State Department of Transportation officials and Bill Jones of Twin Peaks Construction were in Nome July 9 to give an overview of the roadwork and speak about possible contracting and job opportunities that may arise from the project. The meeting held at Nome's Mini Con-

"The Last Train to Nowhere" began as well-financed railroad venture in 1903

By Laurie McNicholas

The so-called "Last Train to Nowhere,"-rusty remnants of locomotives and other railroad equipment-draw visitors to the historic site of the Council City & Solomon River Railroad terminal at Dickson about 29 miles east of Nome on the Nome-Council Highway. Sagging into tundra, the pieces are all that remain of a well-financed but unsuccessful project launched in 1903 to build a 50-mile railroad line to Council to freight supplies to miners at Ophir Creek in a rich gold mining district.

"The Council City & Solomon River Railroad was chartered on March 27, 1902, under the laws of New Jersey," writes Howard Clifford in Alaska-Yukon Railroads, An Illustrated History, published in 1999 by Oso Publishing Co. "Incorporators included President Edward A. Olds of New York; Vice President J. Warren Dickson, who also served as general manager; Treasurer Ernest S.

Emanuel; and Secretary A. Dwight Keep. Among the directors were J. H. Émanuel, Jr. of J. P. Morgan and Company, a financial institution also active in the construction of the Copper River & Northwestern railway at Cordova.

"In September 1902, Herman Heinze, a Û.S. Deputy surveyor, revealed that he had completed a survey from the coast near the mouth of the Solomon River to Council City,' Clifford added. "Although he did not announce whether the road would be a wagon trail or a railroad, he did say that the route was a good one with easy grades...." (p. 211). Clifford said the locomotives shipped to Dickson for the railroad were formerly New York Elevated Railroad engines.

In late 1902 seven or eight dredges were making money in the Council area despite the high cost and inconvenience of freighting supplies from Nome, according to Alice Osborne in "The Council City and

Reminders

Nome has a few reminders of our past. In the broad sense of history we are a very young town... a few years over 100. We are fortunate to have a significant photo collection of our early days since just about everyone in the Gold Rush Days had a camera. However, many of our physical structures are gone-victims of flood, fire, or neglect. Yet the early mining days are not the only significant part of our past.

World War II thrust Nome into the forefront of history. The Lend Lease project played a significant role in the battles in Eastern Europe. We have nothing left of those days but the T-hangar near Satellite Field, old military hospital bunkers behind the high school and a few rusty Quonset skeletons on the back side of Anvil Mountain. In the 1950s there was the Cold War where we maintained vigilance against Soviet invasions and maintained communication through a series of White Alice towers. The four White Alice towers that grace our backyard atop Anvil Mountain were part of Nome's contribution to our national defense.

These huge towers, which resemble gigantic drive-in movie screens, have been looking over Nome's shoulder for about 60 years. They are part of our history and worth saving. They should not be torn down, but turned over to the City of Nome for safekeeping and public awareness of our not so distant past. They are Nome's version of the Coliseum, Pyramids and the Great Wall. Let's not erase history. Let's not hesitate to speak out in favor of saving our White Alice.

Solomon River Railroad," published in the winter 1975 edition of The Alaska Journal, pp. 49-54.

Osborne said supplies were boated from Nome to Golovnin Bay for $15 a ton, from there to White Mountain for $10 per ton, and from White Mountain to Council at $22.50 a ton. "From Council the 7mile Wild Goose Railroad—a sort of detached subsidiary of the Nome line-ran to some of the claims and charged $10 a ton for delivery," she wrote. "Freight from Nome thus added up to $57.50 per ton. But the unfortunate miners whose claims were not on the Wild Goose Railroad had to hire teams for the haul from Council City. The cost was $25 per day, and the ordinary team could not haul more than 1,500 pounds through the muck and mire of the tundra.'

The Nome Nugget reported on May 9, 1903 that the Western Alaska Construction co. of Chicago had been granted right-of-way by the government to build the Council City and Solomon River Railroad with capital of $1 million, Osborne noted.

Osborne said the company's general manager, J. Warren Dickson, named the railroad's coastal terminal and supply base near the mouth of

Dear People,

Not "no," but hell NO will towers at Anvil Mountain be removed. These are structurally sound with spacious interiors and need to be a southern terminal for a monorail to Pilgrim Hot Springs, with a stop at Salmon Lake. This can include such amenities as restaurant, ski-lodge, hotel, and information/science center. This needs to be a year-round operation with freight capacity for transport of materials and people.

Such an arrangement could eliminate the "Beam Road/Kougarok highway, with its seasonal limitations and ultra-high maintenance.

ward, rather than forward-looking and lacking in imagination.

Asbestos? A small problem. Nobody seems too concerned about the former Wien building covered with asbestos across from City Hall.

Think about it. JP Thomas Nome, AK

Three Coast Guardsmen killed in helicopter crash

Three Coast Guardsmen based at the Coast Guard Air Station in Sitka died in a helicopter crash off the Washington coast near La Push on July 7. They were Lt. Sean Krueger, Aviation Maintenance Technician First Class Adam Hok and Aviation Maintenance Technician second class Brett Banks. A fourth crewmember, Lt. Lance Leone survived the crash and is hospitalized in Seattle. The Sitka crewmembers were flying an updated Jayhawk helicopter from Seattle back to Sitka when the crash occurred. There is no indication yet what caused the helicopter to go down. Governor Sean Parnell ordered state flags to be lowered to half-staff for one day.

Former Nomeite is new Commissioner of Commerce, Comand munity Economic Development

Susan Bell, formerly of Nome, was last week appointed to be the new commissioner of the Department of Commerce, Community and Economic Development. She replaced Emil Notti, who retired from the position on Friday, July 9. Bell was a special assistant to Parnell until her commissioner's appointment and had served as a steering committee member for Alaska Forward, a statewide economic development planning initiative. Bell is a shareholder of BSNC and Sitnasuak Native Corporation, Bell received a bachelor's degree from the University of Alaska.

State fights polar bear habitat designation

Quoting an independent study, the State of Alaska is challenging Ú.S. Fish and Wildlife Service data that estimated the economic impact of a polar bear critical habitat designation to be almost $670,000 over a 29-year period. The state contends that the USFWS estimate is too low. In a statement Governor Sean Parnell said that an independent review commissioned by the State of Alaska and Arctic Slope Regional Corporation estimated the costs might be in the hundreds of millions in just the next 15 years. The USFWS has proposed designating an area of 187,166 square miles as critical habitat for polar bears. Designating critical habitat is a step required by law when a species is listed threatened under the Endangered Species Act. The state requested that critical habitat not be designated at this time and challenges the Interior Departments' 2008 decision to list polar bears as threatened in court.

Student loan repayment assistance given for health practitioners

Last week, a combined federal and state grant program paid out its first round to health care practitioners who are still repaying their student loans. The caveat is that they have to live and work in areas of the state that are considered underserved, which is most of Alaska. The program is designed to attract, recruit and retain health care providers to Alaska and especially bush Alaska. During this first round of payouts, no practioners from Nome received grants.

These grants are funded through the federal Health Resources and Services Administration and the Alaska Mental Health Trust Authority. The program is called SHARP, short for Supporting Health Care Access through loan Re-Payment. It is now accepting applications from health practitioners with a July 30, 2010 deadline.

Woman chases bear, Anchorage police get wet in making arrest

Two unusual cases kept Anchorage police on their toes last week. One case involved a traffic stop for speeding in a construction zone. The driver raced off and his attempt to elude the police ended with an extended swim in a lake. When cornered by police, the driver jumped into Waldron Lake. Other police units responded and surrounded the lake. When the driver got out of the lake and Lt. Gilliam approached him to place handcuffs on him, the driver jumped back into the lake. For 15 minutes the driver refused to come out of the lake. Anchorage Fire Department then responded with a small boat and officers took the suspect into custody after a short struggle. The driver, now in custody refused to identify himself, giving a false name. He was finally identified as Joshua Ellis, a 29-year-old Anchorage resident. He was held on $5,000 bail and was arraigned on Friday.

In another case, the police responded to a report of a woman chasing a black bear, who had snatched up her handicapped pet rabbit. The police found out that a black bear had jumped the fence in the woman's front yard and had taken off with her rabbit. The rabbit named "George' was known in the neighborhood because its back legs were paralyzed and his owner had fashioned a twowheeled cart so he would have mobility. He was to be used as a therapy animal. "George's" owner upon hearing the cries of her rabbit chased the bear in her stocking feet across several vards and down an alley before the bear reportedly turned and con-fronted her. The bear had the upper hand and left the area with the rabbit.

$1 million endowment to benefit "old" students

Those seeking a second career or wanting to go back to school are in luck as a $1 million endowment from the Bernard Osher Foundation allows the University of Alaska Fairbanks to extend a scholarship program to help so-called nontraditional students. The endowment can pay up to $5,000 per academic year for 12 students. Students between the ages of 25 and 50 who show academic promise and commitment to obtaining a bachelor's degree are preferred.

Military needed to pluck climber from Mt. McKinlev

A drama-laden rescue took place

last week when a 25-year old solo climber from Pennsylvania had to be evacuated from the 14,200-foot camp on Mt. McKinley. Mountain rangers became increasingly alarmed after his erratic behavior revealed signs of mental illness with a likelihood of causing serious harm to himself or others. At first, the climber had plans to paraglide from the summit, which is prohibited in Denali National Park. Then, rangers and other climbers reported that the man was unprepared in terms of gear and glacier experience, that he didn't dispose of his human waste properly and littered. At the 14, 200-foot

BSNC: Permit needed to visit Pilgrim Hot Springs

By Tyler Rhodes

People heading out to Pilgrim Hot Springs for a soak will now need to pack along another item in addition to their towel and bug dope.

Bering Straits Native Corp. is requiring that visitors to the springs first stop by its offices to obtain a permit before going to the site north of Nome. According to Matt Ganley of BSNC's Land and Resource Department, the new rule was spurred chiefly by concerns over liability. "The permits are simply waivers. If someone hurts themselves out there, it hurts the group who purchased the hot springs," he said.

Bering Straits is the managing partner of Unaatuq LLC, the partnership formed by several regional organizations to purchase the property from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska in March. The Catholic church sold off the property to pay off claims by victims of sexual abuse at the hands of clergy.

Also out of concern for liability, Ganley said the buildings at the site are being boarded up this week. Outside of the boarded windows and doors, and some flagging related to a University of Alaska Fairbanks geothermal study, Ganley said the property remains as it has for the past several years.

The area boasts an old chapel and barn, among other buildings, that are showing the signs of age and little recent maintenance. There is a crude, old wooden tub at the site that is fed by a tube continually pumping out hot water from the hot springs. A few warm ponds also dot the property. For years, area residents have generally used the area unimpeded. "We just hope people take care of it as they have," Ganley said. "Nome and the community have done really well is seeing that it hasn't degraded in time. We just hope that continues.'

Ganley said the permits can be obtained from BSNC's offices on Front Street in Nome from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. on week days. They are valid for one day. Ganley said camping on the property is prohibited. BSNC is also not allowing hunting or fishing on the property.

Ganley said the new rule comes as BSNC and its partners in Unaatuq determine how the property will be used. While the permits currently cost no money, Ganley said he didn't know if that could change in the future as Unaatuq determines the costs of maintaining the site. "This is sort of developing," he said. "It's a new thing for the owners. We're doing our best to see that the community needs are met also.'

foot traffic for Front Street shops and pose traffic hazards on Steadman.

Sitnasuak issued a resolution in March opposing the Steadman location and essentially any new state building unless the for-profit Sitnasuak Native Corp. built the project. The council took its action to beat a July 16 deadline. No promises were made for state funding or contract awards to any letter writers, but the call opened the door to possible acceptance of alternative sites, subject to state procurement laws.

A plan has been circulating amid people who draw on placemats and table cloths concerning the city's hope to consolidate Sitnasuak's lot with purchased or leased land under the old pharmacy and Sackett's landromat/bar shop. There's talk of perhaps even vacating Lane's Way to make enough parking and office space to counter the state's design to put a 60,000-square-foot building at the gold company site.

That rumor came into sharper focus as Councilman Jim West Jr. abstained from a vote on the motion whose approval otherwise would have been unanimous. West, owner of the old pharmacy property, cited conflict of interest. Council members did not pause for a customary ruling by Mayor Denise Michels on whether a stated conflict prevented a vote.

The action came at the end of the regular Council meeting that followed a 40-minute secret meeting during which Sitnasuak Chief Executive Officer Trudy Sobocienski presented Sitnasuak's vision for the building to council members, including West. Additionally, Sitnasuak executives have been courting the state Department of Administration which oversees lease arrangements. State procurement laws say the state cannot lease or buy from single sources without opening up a bidding program and published project requirements, but can deal directly with municipalities like Nome.

The state's June 25 request for information/letter of interest asked for a statement of the size of a proposed building within a 3.5-mile radius of the post office on Front Street, in ADA compliance, with the parking plan for visitors and employees spelled out, the relation of the location to flood zones, and when the building would be ready to receive state agency offices. Additionally, the project must be within 250 feet of the existing public road and utility system. The Alaska Gold Co. site also falls within these parameters.

The state has favored the Alaska Gold site for a building large enough to hold all the state agencies wanting to move, as well as security for the justice system offices, including the district court offices. The Nome Planning Commission has already approved a preliminary plat for the Steadman site with a tacked-on condition that traffic routes and parking be made clearer. Earlier this year, the council applauded the Alaska Gold site, but faced with opposition from Front Street interests, reversed its approval in favor of a Front Street site.

The past two decades have seen a large number of Front Street businesses disappear: M'Lord and Lady, Glue Pot, Fat Freddies, True Value Hardware, Billiken Bakery, Betty Gustafson's jewelry shop, Wallace Liquor Store, Charlie Wansor's plumbing shop, Bilbo's Books, The Merc, Bering Sea Saloon, Alaska Commercial and more.

so members felt they should look at other sites and make recommendations to the council.

During meetings in the past couple of weeks, Handeland said the commission considered a property next to the Mini Convention Center for the Richard Foster Building, but because of past activities at the site. questions were raised about a longterm environmental liability in the cleanup and demolition process, and the site is in a flood plain.

Handeland said the council will receive a resolution from the museum and library commission which approved a motion by Ron Engstrom to recommend to the council that the Richard Foster Building be constructed on the Front Street site. The motion will also recommend that the city manager be authorized to negotiate with land owners to acquire the property. A motion by Marlene Saclamana recommended that the architect who designed the museum building for Anvil City Square be retained to design the Richard Foster Building for the Front Street site.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel, who is a member of the museum and library commission, said the Nome Historical Foundation has received contributions that can help fund construction of the building.

In answer to a question from Councilman Stan Andersen, Handeland said the architect was paid $50,000 to design the proposed museum building for the Anvil City Square site. Andersen suggested that voters be asked at the next city election where they want the museum building located or whether they even want it. "We will have to bond for it," he said.

"The museum and library commission is just a recommending body," Handeland noted. "We hope to have plans and a design in sufficient form to ask for more funds at the next legislative session.'

Andersen asked if the price tag for the building designed for Anvil City Square was $15 million. The architect thought the building potentially would cost $16 million to construct. Handeland replied. He told Andersen that he believes the Richard Foster Building can be constructed for about $12 million.

The Alaska State Museum recently awarded the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum a Grant-in-Aid of $1,950 for a cataloging project.

Dispatch services agreement

The council unanimously approved by resolution an agreement between the Alaska Department of Public Safety and the City of Nome for dispatch services. The agreement says the city will provide dispatch services for the Nome office of the Alaska State Troopers after hours, weekends and holidays, and the DPS will make quarterly payments of $5,000 to the city for a total of $20,000 annually. The term of the agreement is one year ending June 30, 2011. In the past the city has provided dispatch services for the DPS without a formal agreement. Prior to approving the agreement, Councilman Jon Larson said $20,000 seems a minimal amount for dispatch services, and he asked how the figure had been developed. Police Chief John Papasodora said he had learned from the DPS that $20,000 is the maximum amount available. Papasodora added that he had worked with formulas including numbers of dispatch calls and man hours involved to compute the cost and had found that $20,000 is a fair price. Dispatch services are staffed 24/7 anyway, he noted. City Manager Josie Bahnke said the city initially had asked the DPS for a lot more money for the services.

Utility manager's report

Nome Joint Utility System's water and sewer project on Sixth Avenue is going well, and the Sixth Avenue pump house has been demolished and is being rebuilt to improve water pressure, Handeland reported. He said he had found the utility's wind monitor tower in a heap, and the utility will install a shorter one as demanded by the Alaska Energy Authority.

City manager's report

Highlights of Bahnke's report include the following. The state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities has awarded the Nome Roads project to Twin Peaks Construction Inc. The Nome Eskimo Community project to upgrade 0.5 miles of road in Nome with a high float surface and improve drainage is out to bid. Work continues with NEC and Bristol Engineering on right of way/easement issues and the preliminary re-plat of Lot 13, which the city owns. Bids will be opened July 16.

The Alaska Division of Homeland Security Management awarded $75,000 to the city for additional communications equipment and training through the Interoperable Emergency Communications Equipment Program. Bahnke thanked Chief Papasodora and Emergency Services Administrator Alaine Tate for helping to secure the funding. Police officers are being recruited to replace officers Mark Harreus and Doug Boyer, who have resigned.

Energy audits for the City Hall, XYZ Senior Center, Fire Hall and Public Works facility are complete. Audit reports include observations, recorded data, thermal images and recommendations for energy saving projects for each facility. The contractor for the audits suggested that the city form an ad hoc energy committee to review the audits and recommend projects to the council. The city has about $154,000 in funding from the Alaska Energy Authority to spend on upgrades. Andersen volunteered to represent the council on the committee.

Knodel reappointed

The council unanimously agreed to reappoint Knodel to a three-vear term as the City of Nome's representative on the Norton Sound Health Corp. board of directors.

Part two of a series: White Alice is not forgotten

By Sandra L. Medearis

A decision that might take down Anvil Mountain White Alice antennas has been pushed back a few days to July 21, while supporters of the Cold War historical icon scheme a solution to rid the former communication site of contaminants.

Trudy Sobociensky, CEO of Sitnasuak Native Corp announced postponement of the decision at Nome Common Council July 12.

Sitnasuak has been awarded the property at the top of the mountain by its current owner, the U. S. Air Force. But before SNC can take legal possession, the land must pass squeaky clean through the federal Bureau of Land Management. The USAF has contractors at the top of the mountain removing PCBs from the dirt, but there is also contamination in the towers themselves. The flat backs contain asbestos. Even if the asbestos is removed, there would be maintenance costs.

The City and SNC are collecting information to weigh various solutions.

Meanwhile, many over the past week have posted strong support for letting the four towers stand as they have for more than 50 years.

Eleven-year-old Josh Bourdon read articles about the towers' possible demise and sent a note to an email address set up by supporters.

"But when I was done reading, I realized what an idiotic choice! If I was lost in the wild, I SWEAR I would look for those towers!" Bourdon wrote. "When I am on my way back to camp, I look for those towers. I agree and I strongly believe that none of those towers should be torn down. They are part of Nome's history. I wish they will never be torn down."

From an intern spending the summer in Nome, who noted the White Alice Communication System's significance in the Cold War:

"Although the threat of Soviet aggression never materialized, and was perhaps exaggerated, the towers served as an important advance notice of air raids or invasion," Ned Brasington wrote. "They are an important part of local history and should be maintained.... If maintaining the towers is less expensive than demolition, then the towers should be maintained."

Various numbers are floating around concerning the cost of annual maintenance to SNC should the towers be expunged of asbestos and sealed with safe material, a cost that may be in the thousands.

The towers fascinated Matt and Carol Turner, new residents of Nome. They took a trip to see what was on the mountaintop and then learned the historical significance of White Alice, which joined several communications systems for a total of 71 stations.

"I think we are getting away from our American History; it is very important and we need to keep it alive," Matt Turner wrote. "We all need to make our voices known to save these awesome towers. With all of us 'Nomeites' sticking together we can make this happen."

Hank Irelan sees the towers with commercial value, "a good location for differential GPS locators for mining and surveying and cell phone equipment."

And besides, they are good navigational aids for travelers by car in summer and snow machine in winter.

"When you pop up over capes Nome or Rodney, there are two things that are a welcome sight—the lights of Nome and the towers during the day," Irelan said. "The towers are more than a mast or a pole sticking in the ground. Their arrangement also determines which direction which in turn lets you know your location to them and the surrounding area."

SNC's local land manager, Bruce Tungwenuk, last week confirmed that the contaminants had to be addressed before BLM would convey the site.

"The USAF owns the towers presently. It is out of our hands," Tungwenuk said.

Present and past fishermen, pilots and boaters use the towers for locators as well as ham radio operators who have equipment at the site that is important in tracking for Search and Rescue operations and connecting checkpoints for sporting and race events.

But there is another group of men and women residing in Alaska and Outside that love the towers as mementos of the through-thick-and-thin camaraderie of operations, maintenance and construction in the frigid remote sites where quarters might be barracks or tent space not much bigger than a dining room table.

Stan Harhut of Anchorage was a supervisor most of the 22 years he worked at Anvil Mountain White Alice, known as AVM station, from 1956-1978. He remembers employees still here and some that have passed on.

Harhut said Monday the staff usually ran about 10—mechanics, janitor, power operators, and snow mover, technicians. Harhut started as a technician and moved on up the ladder.

"I came for two years and ended up staying until they shut it down," he laughed.

"I had an extremely good job at White Alice," Harhut said. "I thank the Lord for that."

And the pay was phenomenal for those days.

"It was based on six days a week, nine hours a day—14 hours of overtime.

But it wasn't all cake.

"It was cold. It was treacherous. The worst was the winter of 1958," Harhut, 79, still remembers.

He would hate to see the towers lie down.

"It was a landmark for Nome. When you saw White Alice, you knew you were in Nome. Flying a plane, you knew where to start circling," Harhut said.

Ron Engstrom worked at White Alice project though 302 heavy equipment union. He remembers that at first, there was only a road up the north, back side of the mountain. Then the now existing south-side road went in, mostly used today. Harhut backs him up.

"We used the back road in the winter—it was more safe," he said. "Tommy Johnson kept roads extremely good and cleared of snow."

Harhut had other praise for the late Thomas Johnson, Harhut's lead mechanic.

"He was one of the greatest mechanics. He knew his work. You had to improvise parts, make a Chevrolet part make do for a Dodge vehicle, and he knew how."

Bill Everly of Tonasket, Washington, worked at six or eight of the 31 White Alice stations spanning Alaska from Barrow clear down the Aleutian Chain. He worked at Anvil Mountain. Everly has put together a Web site remarkable for the breadth and depth of the information on White Alice and the men and women who worked on the communication system that could use tropospheric scatter technology to bounce radio signals off a layer of the atmosphere to reach antennas at the next station below the horizon.

"'Tropo' works on the principle that if you use very large antennas and blast enough RF power at the horizon, enough of the signal will be reflected off the troposphere to provide a usable signal at the receiver site. Communication distances of several hundred miles are possible with enough power. Transmit powers on the system were 1, 10 and 50kw, according to Everly's tech page. "The longest original link was the Cape Lisburne-Kotzebue path at 168 miles."

On Everly's Web site, one can spend hours looking at photos and reading about White Alice telecommunication history, technical stuff, see a system map showing how the stations networked the state.

But that's not all. There is a guest book link started in 2002 where the men and women who worked in the White Alice Communication System write a few words about their memories—some say their White Alice job was the best of their lives—or just check in from time to time. Most provide contact information.

"Farmer" Ed Alspaugh (Cape Lisburne 1976-77): "Funny how a place like that sticks with you all these years."

Kay Horton, Wasilla: "Still alive...hope the rest of my cohorts have fared as well."

Tim McClelland, Anchorage; "I worked from 1971 to 1973 as a painter for ITT Arctic Services, I had the pleasure of meeting many of the techs and support personnel in Granite mtn, Anvil mtn, Kal Creek, Kotzebue, Cape Newenham. Many great memories, lots of stories. I remember Charlie Moon died in his cabin of carbon monoxide poisoning. Does anyone remember Buddy Payne?

Everly's Web site recounts history of White Alice Communication System in one of the most enjoyable modes—with first-hand impressions from people speaking from experience, to make it live.

Mike Shaw, Dennison, Texas: "Keep this thing going and folks like me will help spread the word. As our numbers fade, we need to keep the memories alive."

Norton Sound reds and kings close due to weak runs

By Laurie McNicholas

Weak runs of sockeye (red) and king salmon in Norton Sound led the Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game to close all net fishing for sockeyes in the Pilgrim and Kuzitrin rivers and all subsistence and sport fishing for king salmon in the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts last week, according to ADF&G press releases.

A strong chum salmon run continues in most of Norton Sound, and commercial chum salmon fishing is ongoing in all subdistricts except the Nome subdistrict. All chum salmon limits in the Nome subdistrict subsistence areas were waived beginning July 12, reports Jim Menard, ADF&G area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue. The Nome subdistrict subsistence gillnet schedule in marine waters has expanded to six days a week (6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Sunday).

From July 12 through July 25, beach seining is allowed during the subsistence gillnet schedule in fresh waters of Nome subdistrict subsistence areas including the Nome River. The schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday.

"Effective July 26 the department will move to coho (silver) salmon management and the gillnet schedule in the marine waters [of the Nome subdistrict] will be 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Saturday until at least mid-August," Menard said. "The fresh water gillnet schedule will remain the same. When the coho management schedule begins, permit holder will again not be able to use seines.'

In the Norton Sound commercial red king crab fishery, nine crabbers harvested 23,151 pounds of the 30,000-pound Community Development Quota through July 10, Menard reports. The CDQ fishery opened June 28. The open access king crab fishery began July 1, and 22 fishers caught 13,316 pounds of the 370,000pound quota through July 10.

camp, rangers noticed the climber was cold, wet and in distress. While treating the man for hypothermia, rangers discovered paragliding equipment in his sled. The paraglider was seized, prompting even more erratic behavior and foul language. At that point, park rangers sought the advice of the parks' medical director in Anchorage and decided to call in the military's help because they determined that it was unsafe to transport a mentally unstable person within the small confined cabin of the park's high altitude helicopter. The medical director prepared a 72-hour protective order. Two Army Chinook CH 47 helicopters from the 16th Combat Aviation Brigade out of Ft. Wainwright were then dispatched to Talkeetna. They picked up two Denali law enforcement rangers and flew to the 14,200-foot camp. By then, rangers had the 25-year old strapped to a backboard, loaded into the helicopter and flown directly to Ft. Wainright. Alaska State Troopers took him into custody and transported him to Fairbanks Memorial Hospital.

Salazar offers new oil and gas lease sale in AP— The Interior Department is offering 1.8 million acres for oil and gas leases in Alaska's National Petroleum Reserve while promising to protect critical migratory bird and caribou habitat. Interior Secretary Ken Salazar says the department through the Bureau of Land Management will offer 190 tracts with bids to be opened Aug. 11 in Anchorage. The petroleum reserve covers 23 million acres on Alaska's North Slope. The BLM withdrew for consid-eration lands in a buffer zone around Teshekpuk Lake because of its importance to migratory birds. New offshore drilling moratorium introduced

WASHINGTON (AP)— The Obama administration issued a new moratorium on deep-water offshore drilling, and it's no longer based on a specific water depth. Interior Secretary Ken Salazar made the announcement on Monday, arguing that a pause is still needed to ensure that oil and gas companies implement safety measures to reduce risks and are prepared to handle spills. The new moratorium will last through Nov. 30. Unlike the last moratorium, which applied to waters of more than 500 feet, the new one applies to any deep-water floating facility with drilling activities.

Last week, a federal appeals court rejected the government's effort to halt the approval of any new permits for deep-water projects and suspend drilling on 33 exploratory wells.

Berkowitz alarmed about BP's future in Alaska

Gubernatorial hopeful Ethan Berkowitz said he is alarmed by a report that appeared in the Sunday edition of the London Times, saying that BP is discussing the sale of its Alaska holdings at Prudhoe Bay to raise $20 billion to cover damages by the Deepwater Horizon oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico. The London Times report did not name the source and according to APRN, BP spokesman for Alaska declined to clarify. Berkowitz attacked the Parnell administration for not having come up with a plan in case BP pulls out of Alaska.

Roetman returns to Kotzebue as judge

A former Kotzebue assistant district attorney has been selected by Gov. Sean Parnell to see the northwestern Alaska courtroom from the other side of the bench.

Paul Roetman's appointment to the Kotzebue Superior Court judgeship was announced June 9. Roetman served as the assistant DA in Kotzebue from 2005-2008. "I'm very humbled by this opportunity and the trust that Governor Parnell has placed in me," Roetman said in a press release. "My family and I are excited to move back to Kotzebue and be a part of the community again."

The position opened due to the retirement of Judge Richard Erlich.

the Solomon River after himself. The following summary of construction work on the railroad and terminal in 1903 is derived from information in her article.

In July 1903 the steamer Aztec arrived with 4,000 tons of cargo to be landed at Dickson, including two locomotives with boxcars and flatcars for a standard gauge track, a pile driver and a hoisting engine. Additional cargo put ashore later in the season included four million board feet of lumber, 165,000 ties, 50 miles of rails, 104 miles of copper wire and a number of Bell telephones.

Workers were hired for $3 a day with board, and initially a payroll of $30,000 a month supported 160 laborers who worked 10-15 hours a day. In August the workforce had expanded to 450 men and the payroll ran $76,000 a month. In response to the construction activity, six restaurants and five saloons operated day and night at Solomon, located across the river and less than a mile from Dickson.

Most of the work took place at the Dickson terminal. A dock was installed at the river mouth. Wing dams and jetties on both sides were secured by heavy piles to assure six feet of water at low tide. Passengers and freight were unloaded with the use of small boats and lighters.

An office building with a waiting room, a residence for officials with 12 rooms and a bath, and a machine shop with a capacity for four locomotives were constructed. The office building and residence, each two and one-half stories, were lighted by electricity and heated with steam from the machine shop. A 10,000-gallon water tank was installed.

Only about 12 miles of track had been laid by September, reported the New York Times on Sept. 13, 1903.

The article said friends of the Western Alaska Construction Co. management had met Sept. 8 in New York City for a progress report on the railroad project that included "stereopticon views" projected onto a screen. Funding for the venture was provided by the company's directors and their friends, and no stock was for sale, the Times noted.

"It is believed that the entire 51 miles of road will be completed by the end of this year or early next year, for the construction work will now progress much more rapidly," the Times reported. "The men were handicapped at first by insufficient supplies, due to the fact that the traffic from Seattle to Nome has been too heavy for the steamers to carry. The total cost of the railroad will be met from the proceeds of the stock issue already made. No bonds have been issued. The plans of the company involve the construction of some hundreds of miles of road, gridironing the entire peninsula, but for the present the Council City and

KNOM changing

Although listeners will be none the wiser, Nome radio station KNOM was scheduled to change on Wednesday.

hands, starts drive

Celebrating 39 years of service in Nome, KNOM moves into its 40th years under new ownership. The changing of the guard was to be celebrated July 14 with an open house and the kick-off of a massive fundraising campaign to keep the station alive and well.

A new nonprofit operation, KNOM Radio Mission Inc., is endeavoring to raise $1 million to cover the costs of acquiring the station from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska. The bishop was forced to sell off assets to cover the costs of settlements paid to victims of sexual abuse by the clergy.

The radio station, transmitting on both AM and FM frequencies, is a fixture in western Alaska, playing what has to be one of the most eclectic mixes of programming available on the airwaves. Within the span of an hour, a listener may catch a current rock song, a contemporary Christian hit, Alaska Native drumming and singing, a 1950s crooner and a local folk singer. The station also serves as a way to relay messages to friends and families over the airways and is a source of community news, announcements and locally hosted radio shows. KNOM also provides Christian and Catholic programming.

General manager Ric Schmidt said the behind the scenes changes at the station should go undetected. "Listeners, contributors and staff will not notice any difference," he said.

Dubbed "Keep KNOM on the air," the $1 million fundraising campaign will pay for the acquisition of the property, equipment, intellectual property and radio licenses that KNOM held under the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska. Information about the campaign can be found by calling (907) 443-5221.

ore than a dozen students in Shishmaref this summer investigated their island home through the viewfinders of their cameras.

The result is a series of exceptional photographs taken by the youth who participated in Ken Stenek and Rebecca Clement's beginning photography class. The month-long class, an elective course during Shishmaref's summer school session, taught the students the basics of camera operation and how to find good subjects to photograph. "Students shot subject matter throughout the islands. We walked one to two miles daily while taking photos around the community," Stenek said. "The kids found many great things to photograph that they and the community had often never noticed."

During the third week of the course, Anchorage photographer Hal Gage joined the students to share tips on close-up photography and photo editing.

The course culminated with 15 students putting together slide shows of their work to present to the community. "There were many people from the public that viewed and enjoyed the student slide shows,"

Sore muscles after exercise

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

Muscle soreness is an expected part of athletic training. But the soreness is not reserved for seasoned athletes. In a sense, we are all athletes for life. And just like seasoned athletes, at some point, we all experience muscle soreness after exercise or physical exertion.

But exercise is not meant to hurt. The motto "no pain, no gain" does not motivate the average person to swim, run, Muscle soreness associated with resuming exercise, particularly after a prolonged period of relative inactivity or transitioning to a new activity, can be a sign of unbalanced training. It should serve as a warning that, without proper attention to training technique including a gradual increase in exercise intensity, a more serious injury could occur.

Avoiding injuries is especially important when resuming exercise or changing

Warnke-Green, Iris

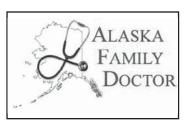

Warnke-Green, Iris Wieler, Derek Wongittilin, Jon Wongittilin, Michael (4.0) Acute injuries like a muscle tear or tendon strain cause pain during or immediately after exercise. The pain associated with these injuries is associated with either damage to muscles or tendons, a build up of lactic acid or fluid (edema) within the muscles or tendons, or acute inflammation of an injured muscle or tendon.

A very common but poorly understood form of exercise-induced muscle pain is called Delayed Onset Muscle Soreness (DOMS). Muscle soreness in DOMS does not occur for many hours after exercise and is not typically a sign of danger or impending muscle damage. In DOMS, muscles do not hurt immediately but begin to ache about 24 hours after exercise. The pain is the worst when performing the same movement that caused the pain. For example, anterior thigh pain from running down steep hills will make it hard to walk down hills, ramps, or steps for several days.

In the world of sports medicine, the causes of DOMS are not well understood. It was once commonly believed that lactic acid build-up was the cause of DOMS, but research shows that lactic acid levels fall to normal within an hour of intense exercise, long before the onset of muscle soreness. Muscle biopsy studies of elite athletes show that DOMS may be caused by micro-injuries to the muscle fibers.

DOMS is almost always caused by eccentric exercises. Eccentric loading of muscles occurs when a muscle is being contracted while it is being stretched. This is what happens to the anterior thighs when trying to slow down while running downhill or to the pectoralis muscles of the chest when lowering the body during a push up. Typically, a muscle gets shorter when it is contracted. This is called concentric contraction.

The pain from any muscle injury whether acute injury or DOMS can range from mildly annoying to severe and debilitating.

Treatment for acute injuries almost always follows the same pattern. First aid includes rest, ice, compression, and elevation of the injured extremity. This initial treatment should be followed by a step-wise focus on range-of-motion, stretching, strengthening, and proprioceptive (balance) exercises, returning to activity as tolerated.

Regarding DOMS, sports medicine specialists disagree about the most effective treatment. Anti-inflammatory medication like ibuprofen or naproxen sodium or warm therapies may provide temporary relief. Studies evaluating vitamin C, massage, ice packs, stretching, homeopathy, ultrasound, and electric current therapy have shown no consistent effect in clinical trials on the alleviation of soreness or speed of recovery. In general, regardless of treatment, the pain usually resolves within 72 hours and subsequent periods of exertion are less likely to cause soreness.

The key is to avoid injury in the first place. Here is where an ounce of prevention really is worth a pound of cure. Most exercise-induced muscle injuries can be avoided with consistent and well-rounded training.

When returning to exercise, or starting a new activity, start slowly, focusing on proper technique in the early stages rather than speed or strength. Stretch gently before exercise, and more importantly warm up with a comfortable walk or lifting of light weights.

Balance eccentric exercises like running downhill with concentric exercises like running uphill, but limit or slowly build up a tolerance for extremes of these two forms of exercise. For example, it is best for a person used to walking on level ground to slowly build up a tolerance for ascending and descending hills.

Athletic exercise is a rewarding way to stay active, reduce disease risk, and feel your best. It can become even more inviting and enjoyable by avoiding unnecessary muscle soreness with proper attention to warm up, exercise technique, and graduated-training intensity.

Smart household savings start in the laundry room

(ARA) - For many families, household budgets are still tight in the wake of the recession. But whether times are tough or not, it makes sense to save money wherever you can. There are plenty of small ways to start cutting costs. One of the best places in your home to start saving is the laundry room.

Whether you're single, share a two-person household or have a big family, finding ways to save money in the laundry room can have a big effect on your budget - and not just in the amount you spend on detergent. Some adjustments to how you wash and dry your clothes can have an effect on utility bills, the amount of time you spend on laundry and even your impact on the environment.

Here are some ideas for smart ways to save that start in the laundry room and have results that go well beyond its walls.

- * Create your own laundry detergents. Armed with borax, washing soda and grated bar soap, you can make a highly effective laundry detergent for a very good value. There are plenty of step-by-step instructions that can be found on the Internet. An extra tip is to add a few drops of your favorite essential oils to create a custom scent that you'll love.
- * Remember to keep it cool. One of the easiest steps you can take is to wash your clothes in cold water. It'll save you money on heating, and it wastes less energy.
- * Let it all your laundry, that is hang out. In good weather, let the dryer sit idle and break out the clothespins. Hanging your clothes is a much more ecofriendly option, but it also adds up to savings on your utility bills. Plus, there's nothing quite like the pleasant smell of clothes that have been hung out to dry in the fresh air. If it's a rainy day, try using drying racks inside your home. Clothes might feel slightly stiff initially, but they soften up shortly after you put them on.
- * Cut your drying time. Sometimes, you just need to use the dryer instead of hanging things out to dry. To cut down on the time your items spend spinning around in the warmth, add dryer balls. Often made from felted wool yarn or scrap fabric from old sweaters, these little laundry aids dramatically cut drying time, which is kind to your wallet and the environment. They can be purchased pre-made or you can make your own there are plenty of resources on the Web that provide detailed instructions.

Some of these solutions - like the FreshCloz dry clean alternative - can even help your clothes last longer, which can add up to major savings. You can find more information about it at www.freshcloz.com Once you see how much you can save by taking these simple steps in the laundry room, you'll want to look for clever cost savings in every room in the house.

Edward Wesley Minton was born in the small logging community of

Edward Wesley Minton

Scotia May 12, 1952 and raised in Fortuna, Calif. He spent his formative years playing football, fishing and hunting with his dad and older brothers, working on his Uncle Al's dairy farm, and drag racing his '57 Chevy on the back roads of northern California. He graduated from Fortuna Union High School and went on to obtain a degree in radiological technology in 1975 from Santa Rosa Junior College.

Ed had the wanderlust and moved his young family to Craig, Colo., in search of open spaces. He began his career in radiology at Craig Memorial Hospital, where he soon advanced to radiology department manager. Over his 32-year career he grew along with medical imaging, learning new modalities as they were developed and eventually specializing in ultrasound. In his free time, he enjoyed "cowboying" in the mountains of western Colorado, hunting elk on horseback with his favorite horse, Monty. Ed was always looking for adventure, and pursued a variety of interests. He loved drag racing, SCUBA diving, surfing, rock and roll, and riding his Harley chopper. He took great pride in his "Jukebox Ford" drag car that he built from scratch.

His wanderlust took him to Alaska in 2001, where he continued to enjoy the wilderness and hunting opportunities while working in hospitals in Petersburg and Nome. In Nome he met and married his much-loved wife, Ileen. He was starting a new adventure in commercial fishing in Norton Sound when he died suddenly and unexpectedly of a heart attack July 6 while visiting with friends in Anchorage.

Celebration of life:

There will be a gathering to celebrate the life of Edward Minton at Ed and Ileen's home at 608 W. 2nd Ave. on Friday, July 16th at 7:30 pm.

Solmon River Railroad is absorbing every attention. Council City is in the centre of a rich mining district. Hundreds of tons of supplies ordered by the mining camps have been held for shipment pending the completion

The Times article cited a complaint from a mine owner in Council who said his freight costs for one season totaled $6,000, and that he would save two-thirds of the freight cost when the railroad was completed. The railroad was never completed. In 1904 a 10-bed hospital with an operating room was constructed on the second floor of the company's offices at Dickson and railroad officials arranged with Alaska Pacific Express Co. to send money orders from Dickson, Shovel Creek and Big Hurrah anywhere in the world and parcels to any point in the United States, but only 1,000 feet of track had been added to the system by July 1, according to Osborne's 1975 article in The Alaska Journal. She said frost and ice slowed construction, and work by 200 laborers employed early in the season focused on repair of the buildings and yards.

The company made plans to lay 30 miles of tracks in the 1905 construction season, but apparently built only a 927-foot bridge across the Solomon River and placed tracks on it, extending the total length of the road to 13 miles, Osborne noted. She said a bill introduced in Congress early in the year for a loan to extend the rail line at a rate of $10,000 per mile after completion of the first 20 miles had received little attention. Dickson resigned his position at about the same time the bill was introduced.

In 1906 the railroad tracks were extended 10 more miles by more than 100 workers under the management of Theodore Knowlton, Osborne reported. She said Knowlton estimated the cost of continuing the road to Council at about $250,000. but the money was not provided and construction stopped at Penelope

Osborne said the railroad seems to have operated at least through the 1907 season with trips to East Fork five days a week and trips to Penelope Creek two days a week. A majority of the footnotes for her article cite various editions of The Nome Nugget from 1902 through 1906.

was working for the state Department of Law as an assistant DA in Palmer. He has also worked as an assistant DA in Anchorage. He earned a bachelor's degree in economics from the University of Alaska and a juris doctorate from Regent University School of Law in Virginia.

According to Roetman's application for the seat, he had also applied for judgeships in the Valdez District Court in 2004 and the Kenai District Court in 2006. During his time working in Kotzebue's DA office, Roetman wrote that he was the single attorney responsible for a heavy criminal and juvenile caseload, covering areas such as minor consuming alcohol, sexual assault and homicide cases. "Paul Roetman has served well in the district attorney's office, and his service in Kotzebue has prepared him for this position on the bench," Gov. Parnell said in a written release. "His experience prosecuting domestic violence and sexual assault cases in several communities, including Kotzebue, is aligned with our statewide campaign to rid our Alaskan communities of this epidemic within 10 years."

Among the 10 who had applied for the seat was Bering Strait Native Corp. Chief Executive Officer Gail Schubert, who said in early January that she had already started the application process for the judgeship when the BSNC board promoted her to the CEO position.

Jimmy West Jr., a search and rescue volunteer, a Nome Common Council member and chair of the Nome Port Commission, said he has had the boat out in five- to six-foot swells and it performed well. He noted that seas will likely be rough when the boat is called out for rescue duty. "We're pretty impressed with it," West said.

It has been years since the fire department has had a larger boat it can use for rescue operations. Assistant Fire Chief Jerry Steiger said the department had a 21-foot Boston Whaler years ago, but has had to rely on a smaller, inflatable Zodiac boat in recent years. While the Zodiac was useful for near-shore rescues—a role the craft will still play, Steiger said—the department had to seek out other options for rescues farther off shore. "We have had to commandeer a local boat that was not our own," he said.

West said with the number of offshore dredges working in the area, it's likely only a matter of time before the new vessel will be called out to work, whether it is for an incident with the craft or a medical emergency for someone on board.

The boat will also likely be called on in the event of a fuel spill near Nome. Earlier in the day Harbormaster Joy Baker said the port was conducting spill response training. Baker said the boat will also be put to work for more routine tasks like maintenance around the harbor.

vention Center drew a handful of participants, including Kawerak's Lew Tobin who asked for details on what jobs could be available and how area residents could apply.

Jones, who is project manager for the construction company, said he didn't have hard numbers on how many workers may be recruited locally but estimated they needed a few flaggers, laborers and possibly equipment operators. He said flaggers would need to have certification. Jones said those interested in employment could e-mail him at bill@twinpeaksconstruction.net.

In addition to a few bodies, Jones said Twin Peaks would also likely need to rent some equipment and hire out trucks and drivers. "It's better logistically to rent some equipment here," he said. He said the company has not yet decided if it would bring its own crusher to Nome for the job.

The specifics of the roadwork are as follows:

• East Fifth Avenue: From G Street to K Street, repairs will be made to the existing asphalt and adding a two-inch asphalt overlay.

• East G Street: Between Third and Fifth avenues, two inches of asphalt overlay will be added to the existing Hi Float surface. Two inches of new pavement will be will be laid between Fifth Avenue and the Nome Bypass Road.

• East H Street: From Third Avenue to Sixth Avenue, nine inches of new gravel will be laid among other improvements.

• East K Street: From Front Street to the Nome Bypass Road, three inches of new pavement will be laid. New catch basins and culverts with heat trace will also be installed.

• The above areas will also receive drainage improvements, necessary utility adjustments and new signage.

• Nome Bypass Road: From N Street to the Nome-Council Highway, the Bypass Road will be widened to 32 feet, receive three inches of new pavement, and have a general grade raise of one to two feet in most areas. Also planned are the replacement of two culverts, the addition of signage and intersection improvements.

Jones said plans are to start work on K Street first with hopes to minimize conflicts between the roadwork and the resumption of class at Nome Elementary School. DOT Project Engineer Tony Cox said an overlap between the start of school and the construction will be inevitable. "There's no doubt in my mind that we're gong to end up with conflicting schedules," he said at Friday's meeting.

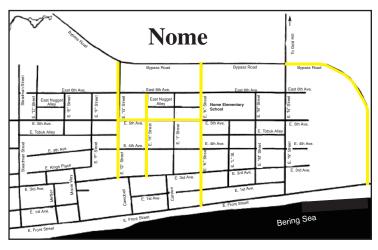

Jones suggested evening work once school ends for the day to try and minimize impacts. "We'll work around the school schedule if we have to," he said. Jones added that personnel from the road crew would work to make sure kids walking to and from school will be able to navigate the construction.

The project has an end date of Oct. 1. Jones did not sound overly optimistic that the full scope of the work would be accomplished by that date. He said a crew may be back next summer to finish up the job. "We're shooting to be done this year, but, realistically, we might not get paved out this year.

down of costs and materials to be used for the project. Approximately $1.1 million will be expended for dirt work, $400,000 in mobilization costs, $650,000 for pavement, $70,000 for electrical work, and $210,000 in drainage improvements and utility adjustments. The DOT said the remaining $600,000 for the project will be spread out over the project for items such as erosion control, traffic control, surveying and seeding, among other items. In terms of materials, the project will require 35,000 tons of gravel, 3,500 tons of asphalt, 720 linear feet of culvert and 50 new signs.

The streets highlighted in yellow will receive gravel and asphalt work this summer. The $3 million project was paid for with federal stimulus funds.

ANVIL MOUNTAIN WHITE ALICE SITE

A decision is slated to be made this month that will determine the fate of the White Alice towers. The Air Force may be requested to remove these landmarks. They served as the community's link to the outside world and played a role in national defense. Today they provide a location for amateur communications repeaters. Many travelers in the area use them as a navigation aid/reference point for land, see and air travel. Tourists, residents and muskoxen visit the site often.

Complex plot hatched for state building

By Sandra L. Medearis

The City of Nome has sent the state governor's office a letter laying out a plan whose success would have a three-story state building cast a tall shadow on Front Street and short-circuit State of Alaska procurement laws, mostly with the use of private money.

The letter is a response to a Department of Administration call for letters of interest in providing office space for local offices of state agencies. The request came after Front Street business owners protested state Department of Transportation and Public Facilities plans to build the $40 million, 60,000-square-foot building at the north end of Steadman Street on land purchased from Alaska Gold Co.

The state has made it perfectly clear that it wants ideas but will not award a project based on the letters of interest. The city's response essentially tells the state to keep their $40 million and to keep the new state building on city tax rolls. The state has been cruising a site for a building to replace the current storm-rotted building standing by the seawall in the floodplain.

The city's plan possibly provides a way for the state to work around procurement laws that rule out sole-source, non-competitive "sweetheart" deals,

Uranium found in Wales water supply

By Tyler Rhodes

The discovery of uranium in the water supply in Wales has residents in the community at the tip of the Seward Peninsula worried and state officials scrambling to figure out the cause.

"This is a complete surprise to everyone in the state. No one in the state has elevated levels of uranium in their drinking water," said Mike Phillips, an engineer and project manager for the state's Village Safe Water program.

Phillips was to travel to Wales Monday and Tuesday to try to ascertain how and where the uranium was entering the village's water system. "We need to first resample before we actually know what's going on there," he said.

Wales Mayor Frank Crisci said the village was notified July 12 of the presence of the radioactive element in its well water. "To have uranium pop out like that is unexplainable," Crisci said.

Tests conducted June 8 by Analytica Group on several water samples taken between Sept. 21, 2009 and May 3, 2010 show a result of 32.5 micrograms per liter of uranium. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's standard for drinking water is a limit of 30 micrograms per liter.

According to Phillips, the wells were drilled in 2000 and 2001, but were not used for the city's water supply until 2007-2008. Phillips said it isn't until the second year of operation that rules require groundwater to be tested for radionuclides. The EPA warns that the presence of uranium in water can lead to kidney damage and increase the risk of getting cancer.

Crisci said the announcement has spurred concern in his small community of approximately 150 residents. Particularly troubling for the mayor is the inability to provide information to his fellow residents beyond the fact that the uranium is present. "A lot of people are calling it junk water. Some people have questions about it which I can't answer at this point."

Council declines to bring back city clerk

By Laurie McNicholas

Sandy Sturgis-Babcock's last day as Nome's city clerk/city treasurer was July 15.

Babcock assumed the position on May 14, 2007 under a three-year contract with the city. She was hired by the Nome Common Council and supervised by City Manager Josie Bahnke. On July 16 The Nome Nugget learned by hearsay that Babcock was no longer employed by the city.

"My three-year contract was up and wasn't renewed," Babcock explained in a phone interview with the Nugget. "I think the council or the city manager want to go in a different direction." She said Mayor Denise Michels informed her of the council's decision during an executive session at a council meeting on July 12 and told her she would receive three months of severance pay.

In keeping with terms of her contract, Babcock said she had notified the city 90 days before its expiration date that she was interested in renewing the contract for another three years. She was extended through July 15.

Babcock said she initially discussed matters related to contract renewal with council members in an executive session at a council meeting on June 28. "We all thought we would talk about the contract on the 28th, but Josie [Bahnke] was sick," she noted. "[The council], asked me a lot of questions and I responded." Discussion of her contract was postponed until July 12 so Bahnke could participate.

Babcock said potential changes in the city clerk/city treasurer position were suggested at the July 12 meeting, but they were discussed in executive session so she declined to describe them. She said she was excused from the meeting at Bahnke's request while discussion continued among council members and Bahnke. When Babcock was called back into the executive session, she learned that her contract would not be renewed. "I did not ask for details why they wanted to change the job description," she said.

Mayor outlines changes

In a phone interview with the Nugget on July 17, Michels said the council wants to separate the city clerk/treasurer position and move financial aspects of the position back to finance, where they should be, and rewrite the position for just a city clerk. She said several of Nome's city managers have recommended the separation; the topic had been discussed in relation to a new finance/clerk computer software upgrade, and reclassification of the position in the offing. "The city clerk was working to the max," she noted. Michels said she thanks Babcock "for her service working as city clerk/city treasurer through the years."

On July 19 the Nugget received a request from the city manager's office to advertise a job opening for city clerk/treasurer for four weeks beginning July 22. The ad lists these qualifications: "Bachelor's degree (B.A.) in business administration and four years experience as an administrative officer. Work experience as an administrative

Dear Nancy,

I'm writing this letter in regards to how political actions and decisions are being taken care of in our village of Golovin. I served my community as mayor for a while but am no longer on the council. I have followed every rule of conduct while I was mayor to run the city in a manner that I not only thought was right but knew was right. I am really upset about how things have been taken care of lately. There has been family members of the city council being hired with the family members on the council voting on the matter. It seems that certain council members are on the council to make it better for themselves and their family instead of making it better for the community. The council should already understand what a conflict of interest means. If a conflict of interest is declared then the declared individual(s) may not take part in the discussion or the decision of the matter stated Golovin's in ordinances. Every council member was sworn into office and by doing so agreed to follow the rules and ordinances that the city has in place. I hope we can work things out and get it right before the City of Golovin gets into a situation that no government body wants to be in. Sincerely, Donald Oliver Golovin, AK

Dear Editor,

As an Alaskan Yupik Native, I have experienced a horrible multitude of discrimination towards myself, as many of us have as Eskimo's.

However, it has become so much like a cancer that only builds on itself that now even immediate and extended family members have been maligned by this atrocity. Now, keep in mind, that I am 32 years old and am immensely contributing member to the good of humanity.

As an alcoholic struggling to quit,

Hush!

There are no secrets in small towns where everyone seems to know everyone else's business. Why bother with "secret" meetings in the public forum? City Council meets in not quite kosher executive sessions with private corporations, the school board meets in hokey executive sessions. Personnel are not quite legally let go in executive

Do we know how much money is paid out in legal settlements to employees who were not given due course? It would seem that we have far too many issues decided beforehand and have the appearance of done-deals before the official public input sessions. One wonders why the secrecy. Corporations are not government entities and should not be doing secret dealings with government. The public, yes the "Little People," deserve to know how their public boards and councils are conducting public business and spending public money.

The citizens of Nome are not ignorant, they are, however, somewhat disgusted with the way public business is done. The problem is that they find out after the deed is done. Nomeites, we need to get more involved in local government. We need to attend council meetings, school board meetings, planning commission meetings, port commission and utility board meetings. We need to scrutinize, give testimony and witness events. We have a right to transparency in our local government, not stonewalling. - N.L.M.-

I can understand how people in general stereotype our fellow Natives. That much is understandable, but our very own family!

A very stern reminder to everyone - cherish your family while they are with you because no matter how you cut it, they're the only things that will be there and time is very limited. At the time of birth we have begun to die. Look at your son or daughter, brother, sister, aunt, uncle and be happy that our Lord God gave this beautiful life to you and know that maybe, just maybe, they maybe the person that may offer the unconditional love that we all crave in this cold, uncaring world.

ON THE DOUBLE - Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. members arrived at a report of smoke and fire beneath Hanson's Safeway, strapped on their air packs, and put practice to work feeding hose under the store.

Young arsonists put shoppers in jeopardy

Preliminary evidence said children playing with matches brought out firefighters and law investigating enforcement Monday afternoon.

Staff at Hanson's Safeway smelled smoke in the video and clothing departments around 3:30 p.m.

"The manager, Pam Parnell, and I went down to the furnace, the first thing we checked," Craig Teesateskie said. However, firefighters found insulation burning beneath the building from an entry on the south side of the building that borders Warren Place, the street that separates store property from Old St. Joe's Heritage Park. Behind the building to the east and away from view, a company owned pickup truck held evidence of arsonists burning items inside. Litter on the ground by the right door also showed signs of fire. Teesateskie blamed children, unsupervised by parents, for the damage.

Nome Police Department is investigating.

officer in a related field with equivalent responsibilities or paralegal experience will substitute for education on a year for year basis." The salary range is $59,000-72,000, depending on experience. Bahnke said Deputy City Clerk Camille Ten Eyck will serve as interim city clerk/treasurer.

Michels said council members did not vote on the question of renewing the contract; they let the agreement end without taking action. When the executive session ended, the regular meeting was reconvened and then adjourned, she added.

In an e-mail to the Nugget on July 19, Michels specified that the council chose not to renew the agreement with Babcock per section 5 of the city clerk/city treasurer contract which reads: "Upon the completion of the Initial Term of the Agreement, it shall specifically not be considered renewed without further action upon the part of the City." Michels said she informed Babcock of the council's decision because as mayor, she is the chief spokesperson for the City of Nome.

Michels e-mailed copies of the agreement and job description for the city clerk/city treasurer to the Nugget. Duties assigned to the city treasurer include signing warrants and checks, receipting funds paid at the counter or by mail; and administering the city sales tax program in conjunction the city's finance department including reporting, collection and enforcement.

During the phone interview with Michels on July 17, the Nugget asked why the city had not made public the council's decision not to renew the contract with Babcock. "She's a contract employee," Michels replied. ...When we choose not to renew a contract, we don't do a press release."

The Nugget asked Michels why the council had not discussed renewal of the contract with Babcock within 90 days after receiving her written notification of interest in renewing the contract.

"I don't know," Michels replied. She suggested asking the council, so the Nugget asked Councilwoman Mary Knodel why the council had not discussed contract renewal with Babcock in a timely manner.

"That's the screwy part; we do the hiring but not the supervising," Kn-odel replied. Asked who is responsible for scheduling discussion of contract renewal between the council and the city clerk/treasurer, Knodel said the city manager is responsible because she supervises the position.

The Nugget asked Knodel if she wants the council to supervise the city clerk. "No, it used to be that way," she replied. "... We changed it to put the city manager in charge [of the city clerk], but did not change the part that says the council does the hiring and firing. It puts the city manager in a bad position." Knodel supports shifting hiring and firing authority for the city clerk position from the council to the city manager. She said Bahnke suggested separating the city clerk/city treasurer position.

"I think Sandy is a great person and did a good job for the city," Knodel added.

The Nugget asked Bahnke why she did not arrange for the council to discuss contract renewal with Babcock within 90 days after receiving notice of her interest in renewing the contract. "We did discuss some strategy to negotiate an agreement," she said, adding that she believed the strategy discussion had taken place in executive session at a council meeting. After checking meeting records, Bahnke informed the Nugget by email that the agenda topic, "Personnel: Discussion of a Contract Renewal with the City Clerk" was addressed in executive session at a council meeting on April 26.

Bahnke e-mailed copies of the agenda and minutes for the April 26 council meeting to the Nugget on request. Agenda items for the executive session in addition to discussion of contract renewal with the city clerk were: Real property issue - Financial and legal strategies which may have an adverse effect on city finances; and City attorney-client privilege-Litigation affecting the City of Nome. The executive session lasted 92 minutes, from 7.59 p.m. to 9:31 p.m.

Babcock said the real property issue was discussed first, probably to accommodate John Handeland, who participated in discussion of the topic, and then the attorney-client issue was discussed. When the council began to address the agenda item titled "Personnel: Discussion of a Contract Renewal with the City Clerk," Babcock said she was excused from the session at Bahnke's request. Babcock estimates that she waited about 30 minutes in her office until the executive session ended and she was asked to return to the council chambers. Then the meeting was adjourned.

Babcock doesn't know what the council discussed while she waited outside the executive session that was convened for the stated reason of discussing contract renewal with her. She said no contract negotiations between her and Bahnke had occurred prior to the April 26 meeting, so there were no contract renewal details to present to the council. "[April] was budget time, and Josie was meeting with each department head, and she had not met with me," Babcock added. She said Bahnke never discussed the city clerk/city treasurer contract with her prior to the July 12 council meeting.

Bahnke told the Nugget that she had been faced with deaths in her family shortly after the April 26 council meeting. "My whole life fell apart April 28," she said. She explained that her father's girlfriend died on that day and her father died 10 days later.

Looking to the future

Babcock looks forward to helping her son and daughter settle into an apartment they will share near the University of Alaska Anchorage campus where both will attend classes this fall. "I was lucky to find the apartment—they can walk to the campus," she said.

Babcock feels she could not have quit her job as city clerk/treasurer even though the workload was heavy and the hours long. "It's one of those jobs where you are really needed," she noted. "It's a lot of responsibility, and to do a responsible job for the City [requires] all those nights and meetings. I'd be there later at night and my husband would ask why, and I said, 'Not because I want to; I have to be." She said the council was fair with her in providing three months of severance pay.

An Open Letter to the Community of Nome and Surrounding Villages Regarding Ownership and Use of Pilgrim Hot Springs

If you read the most recent Nome Nugget, you will have seen two articles related to Pilgrim Hot Springs. Both discussed the current need for visitors to the Springs to obtain a permit from Unaatuq, LLC, through its managing partner Bering Straits Native Corporation. Unaatuq, LLC is taking this opportunity to explain the purchase of the property from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska, as well as the LLC's developing plans for the land.

It is without question that Pilgrim is a place of great importance to the residents of Nome and the greater Bering Straits region. Because of the land's history, particularly its place in the terrible events of 1918, and the orphanage that was operated there until 1942, BSNC began seeking an interest in property in mid-1990's. BSNC met with the CBNA and repeatedly appealed to the Diocese to either sell the property, or allow BSNC to oversee, manage, or improve the property. The BSNC Board of Directors' motives were simple: the property would have been available for selection and conveyance under ANCSA had it been available, and it is a significant site in the family histories of many of BSNC's shareholders. However, these efforts bore no fruit in part due to the existence of a 99-year lease on the property held by Pilgrim Springs Limited.

When the CBNA was forced to enter into bankruptcy proceedings and liquidate its assets, BSNC realized the opportunity to finally obtain the property was now at hand. It was understood that the price for this property would be high, and BSNC appealed to the re gion's village corporations and other local organizations to jointly pursue the acquisition. BSNC along with Sitnasuak Native Corporation, Kawerak, Inc., Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, Mary's Igloo Native Corporation, Teller Native Corporation, and White Mountain Native Corporation, pooled their financial resources and purchased Pilgrim Hot Springs on March 5th through an auction in Federal Bankruptcy Court. On April 27, 2010 the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska issued a quit claim deed to the property and the transaction was finalized. Any and all prior claims or liens to the property were extinguished and deemed invalid, and the property's ownership passed to Unaatug, LLC.

While production of electricity from the geothermal reserves has been discussed for many years and by many parties, the current cost for drilling, plant construction and transmission lines make this prospect highly unlikely into the foreseeable future. Additionally, it is unclear where the actual source of the heat in the valley is located. The University of Alaska has undertaken a study project at the Springs, but the program's goal is not the eventual production of electricity there. Unaatug, LLC will continue to work with research agencies interested in analyzing and utilizing the geothermal resource for heat, electricity, and agricultural potential.

So the questions now are what does the future hold for Pilgrim Hot Springs, and more importantly how does the change in ownership effect people's use of the property? Unaatuq, LLC is developing a land management plan for the property that will guide future efforts in the preservation of property and buildings, outline the parameters for what type of improvements and development may occur there, and what uses are consistent with the region's needs and the property's importance to local residents. One of the plan's core components is preservation of the ecosystem and historical nature of the property. The current plan requires permits for visiting the Property, which currently are issued at no charge. This is a sound management practice, as it protects the user, the LLC, and provides valuable information on the level of traffic and use at the property. Unaatuq, LLC thanks those who have already visited the BSNC office to receive permits. Unaatuq, LLC would also like to encourage local individuals and organizations that have an interest in improving and maintaining the Springs to contact us and discuss possible projects.

Through the years the community of Nome and the region's residents have used the property responsibly. Let's move ahead together for the benefit of the property and preserve the unique characteristics that make Pilgrim Hot Springs such a valuable resource for all. You may contact Unaatuq, LLC through the managing partner, Bering Straits Native Corporation, 110 Front Street, Suite 300, Nome, AK 99762, (907)443-5252 or land@beringstraits.com.

Capsized boat claims one in Shaktoolik

Two men were saved and one perished near Shaktoolik late last week when their boat capsized while working commercial fishing nets in Norton Sound.

According to the Alaska State Troopers, brothers Clarence, 24, and Brian Savetilik, 19, were rescued after being found clinging to a buoy on July 16. A third crewman, Thomas Sagoonick, 36, could not be located at the time the Savetiliks were rescued and was later found deceased on July 18.

Seas were reportedly rough the day the three men went out on the 22-foot aluminum boat. The brothers were rescued by friends who arrived in another boat to pull them from the water. According to the Troopers, none of the men were wearing life jackets.

District settles with Boyer, fills teacher vacancies

By Tyler Rhodes

As the dust settles after months of contention and a bitter community rift over the Nome Board of Education's handling of the contracts for the two former administrators at Nome-Beltz, one of those relieved from duty has received a settlement from the district.

Board member Barb Nickels revealed that the district had agreed to some sort of settlement with Doug Bover, the former assistant principal at the junior/senior high school, during the July 13 board meeting. During the time allotted for board members' open discussion, Nickels requested that the board be provided with the dollar figure on what the district has spent on attorney's fees since the Jan. 12 decision to not renew the two contracts and the settlement offer for Boyer.

Superintendent Jon Wehde confirmed that a settlement had been reached, but said the terms of the agreement prevented him from giving any more detail. "There is an action that can be correctly referred to as a settlement," he said. "The provisions preclude the district from comment. It certainly isn't a spectacular piece of work." Wehde referred to the settlement as a separation agreement and noted that a modest sum of money was paid.

comment was not returned as of press time.

Although Boyer had said at previous board meetings that he was inclined to take his case to court after working through the district's appeal process, Wehde said no lawsuit was filed by Boyer against the district.

Outside of saying Boyer's contract was initially withheld for budgetary reasons in January, the school board has never offered an explanation for not bringing the assistant principal or principal Janeen Sullivan back for another year. The issue bitterly divided much of the community and resulted in a recall election for the entire board. Two board members lost their seats after a protracted election process that had an ever-changing vote count.

Boyer will work as an administrator in the Bethel School District next year. Sullivan will remain with Nome Public Schools as the district's new coordinator of curriculum and assessment.

Taking the helm at Nome-Beltz this year will be Steve Gast, who has spent the majority of his career working as a principal in various schools in Texas. Joining Gast at the junior/senior high school will be Carmen Russo who is set to receive her administrator certification this summer.

New leadership will also take the

In addition to running the elementary school, Keller will serve as the district's special education director.

In addition to the openings at the top, the district also had to staff several teaching positions, chiefly at Nome-Beltz. New to the district next year will be junior high math teacher Kevin Busk, junior high social studies teacher Josh Vaughn, junior high/elementary special education teacher Janice Glover, senior high English teacher Randi Taylor-Habib, senior high social studies teacher Kent Runion, senior high math teacher Rebecca Lindquist, elementary special education teacher Linda Todd and junior/senior high special education teacher Marty Wood. Returning to the district after an absence will be Lynn DeFilippo as a junior high English teacher. Krista Marvin will be moving from the junior high to the elementary school as a fifth-sixth grade teacher in the district's new program for those two grade levels. Brian Marvin will be joining the district from the Northwestern Alaska Career and Technical Center to work as a high school science teacher.

Despite all the new faces, the district is looking to fill out a few more spots. The board learned of the resignation of Bernie Alvanna-Stimpfle as the Alaska Native Education Coordinator and Margaret Thomas as a Title 1 paraprofessional. The district is still on a continual lookout for a senior Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps instructor.

The JROTC program in Nome made a comeback after being on the brink due to funding cuts from the district and city. The private sector stepped in with Sitnasuak footing the bill for the program through a state program that allows the donation as a tax write-off. The Nome program has been on a probationary status, however, as the national JROTC program requires a senior instructor to continue. "It's all over on June 30, 2011, if we can't have an officer come on board," Wehde told board members at the July 13 meeting.

In other business...

With the recall election settled and two newly appointed members on board, the school board voted to reorganize its leadership. Gloria Karmun remained as president. Kirsten Timbers was named vice president/clerk. Barb Amarok was named treasurer.

The board officially changed the district's mission statement. A new statement was developed during the district's strategic planning process held in late 2009 and early 2010, but was never officially ratified by the board. The new statement, now official, reads, "Nome Public Schools will educate students in a positive learning environment to be competent and productive citizens.'

The board has cancelled its work session scheduled for July 27. The agenda will be moved to the August session which should be held Aug. 24. At that meeting, the board intends to address the question of whether security cameras are needed for the district, the requirement that employees wear identification badges, board committee assignments, the use of federal stimulus funds to pay for energy efficient lighting, and the use of the pool for school classes, among other subjects.

reins at Nome Elementary School as A message sent to Boyer seeking David Keller returns to the district. Unlocked car

By Tyler Rhodes

Nome has recently experienced a rash of car thefts, and police say the incidents have all had one element in common—the owners left their keys somewhere in the car.

"In the last week, there have been several vehicles that have been stolen and recovered locally. In each and every one of these vehicles a set of keys have been left to allow someone to steal their vehicle," reads a press release from the Nome Police Department.

Police Sergeant Byron Redburn said Monday that the department has a couple of suspects but has made no arrests in the matter. He said the investigation is ongoing.

Redburn said those who had reported their vehicles taken were lucky to get them back relatively in order. "All have been recovered and none are severely damaged," he said. "But it's just a matter of time."

Redburn said stolen cars are not unheard of each year when it gets warm in Nome. "It will happen in the summer generally, but for each and every vehicle that has been stolen, the keys have been left there for them," he said. "I have yet to see them hot wired, unless it was the old, beat-up truck where you stick the screwdriver in the ignition; and even those still had the screwdriver in it."

In addition to the cars themselves, vehicles with unlocked doors in Nome have been easy prey for thieves who rifle through to find iPods, cash and other valuables for the taking. Redburn and the department urge citizens to both remove their keys from the car and lock the doors to help prevent theft.

The lesson does not only apply to cars. A number of people have also reported stolen bikes over the last few weeks. "Every summer people report stolen bikes, every winter people report stolen snowmachines,' Redburn said. "There again, people are not securing their property.'

The department asks that anyone witnessing cars being broken into call the police at 443-5262.

Sitnasuak again searches for a new president/CEO

By Tyler Rhodes

Sitnasuak Native Corp. is again looking for someone to fill the seat at the top.

Trudy Sobocienski, who has served as the Nome area Alaska Native Corporation's president and chief executive officer since the spring of 2009, said the corporation's board of directors has voted to not renew her contract. "I was told the executive committee chose to not renew my contract," she said Monday.

Sitnasuak is advertising the CEO position on its website and in this week's Nome Nugget.

While out of one job, Sobocienski will be landing into another. She said she has accepted a job as the chief executive officer of another village corporation with offices in Anchorage. She declined to name the corporation.

Sobocienski said she informed the board of the pending job offer with the other village corporation as the board was reviewing her contract and salary agreement. "I let the chair know that there was another job offer out there and I needed to respond to them," she said. "I need to know I have employment so I can feed my family."

Sobocienski would not go into detail over possible rifts between her and the board of directors. "I think the board and I have two very different visions for the future," she said. "I would hope that their vision is going to be successful because I am a shareholder."

A message left with Sitnasuak board chair Crystal Andersen-Booth for comment was not returned by press time.

Sobocienski had a one-year contract with the board that is set to expire Aug. 31. Before being officially named to the position, she served in the role in an interim capacity while still serving on the corporation's board of directors. Sobocienski replaced Robbie Fagerstrom who was ousted from his position in May 2009. Fagerstrom is involved in a legal dispute with the corporation that is largely centered on the handling of one of the corporation's subsidiaries.

Sobocienski said when she took over the reins as president and CEO, the corporation was in need of a housecleaning. "We accomplished a lot of things. There was a lot of cleanup that needed to be done," she said.

Sobocienski said Monday morning that she was unaware of how the board would deal with the remainder of her contract until the end of August. "I'm just in a holding pattern," she said. "I'm assuming I'm just kind of hanging around until they come up with a transition plan."

using a loophole in the law that allows noncompetitive deals on a government-to-government basis. The proposal then clears the way for City of Nome to sign a sole-source, non-competitive contract allowing Sitnasuak to build, manage and collect public money in rents from a state building on Sitnasuak's large lot on Front Street. The plan would require Sitnasuak to buy land from two other private landowners, Mark Sackett and Councilman Jim West Jr., for parking spaces.

The city, in secret meetings with Sitnasuak and landowners, has developed three options, one of which would require vacating Lanes Way and selling it to Sitnasuak. The fivepage proposal comprises a two-page letter and three design drawings involving public funds, the discussion of which was not available to the public. Open meeting laws are predicated on allowing the public to witness debate and follow the thinking of their representatives while they arrive at decisions involving expenditures of public money and resources, i.e., sale of a public street. Stapled to the proposal is a letter of support from Nome Chamber of Commerce and letters from Sackett and West vowing to negotiate sale of their land in good faith.

On the one hand, the document starts off with, "The City is very interested in entering a binding agreement or contract on a government to government basis with the State of Alaska to design, bid, build and then lease with the option to purchase a new State Office Building [sic] in the City of Nome."

Bid? Not in the plans. "Given the unique nature of this public/private sector partnership, it would be the intent of the City to contract the construction and management of the building to Nanuaq, LLC (a subsidiary of Sitnasuak Native Corp.) who is also majority landholder in the proposed project. Nanuaq LLC would act as the construction manager/general contractor on the project pulling together the long-term financing, design and construction of the project."

Business owners said taking the state offices off Front Street would make the main drag seem deserted and would drop their property values. The for-profit Sitnasuak Native Corp. executives sounded the alarm that losing state rentals from their Front Street building would damage the interests of Sitnasuak shareholders. Others objected to causing traffic congestion and hazards on Steadman Street.

Councilwoman Mary Knodel laid out the details of the plan developed in private between the city and Sitnasuak. This plan proposes the government-to-government relationship between the city and the state.

The city would, in a contract with the state, guarantee a building to suit the state specifications for office space within 10 months from signing of construction documents. The state's June 25 request for information/letter of interest asked for a statement of the size of a proposed building constructed within a 3.5-mile radius of the post office on Front Street, in ADA compliance, with the parking plan for visitors and employees spelled out, the relation of the location to flood zones, and when the building would be ready to receive state agency offices. Additionally, the project must be within 250 feet of the existing public road and utility system. Both the Sitnasuak and Alaska Gold Co. sites satisfy the parameters.

Sitnasuak would be required to purchase a bond to cover fines, delays in building and failure of funds. Memoranda of understanding between the city, Sitnasuak and state would spell out the agreements under which Sitnasuak would handle management of the building but lease the building to the city. The city would in return lease the building to the state, with Sitnasuak paying an administrative fee to the city to service the state lease. After 15 to 20 years, the state would have the option to buy the building from Sitnasuak. But lots of details have to be worked out, according to Knodel.

"Some options have to be worked out, but in a way that it won't cost taxpayers anything," Knodel said. "Sitnasuak will have to buy the vacated portion of Lanes Way from the city at a fair-market-value price."

Meanwhile, the success of the city's proposal would leave Alaska Gold holding the bag on its intended sale of acreage for the state building site. The DOT has provided preliminary design work and environmental studies on that land. In May, Alaska Gold sought and achieved approval from Nome Planning Commission on a preliminary plat of the land the state was poised to buy.

Earlier this year, DOT project

PROPOSED SITE—A pitch from the city to State of Alaska spells out a deal with Sitnasuak Native Corp. to put a three-story building on this Front Street vacant lot owned by Sitnasuak and currently used for parking.

manager Matt Desalernos said preliminary site studies told him he could not find a lot of sufficient size, out of the flood plain, and yet on Front Street, to accommodate a building large enough to house the justice secured space under one roof, the state court system and other agencies wanting to join the new building. The small size of lots drawn on an old town plat would necessitate dealing with several owners, something the state did not want to do, according to Desalernos.

Nikolai Ivanoff, land manager for Alaska Gold in Nome, echoed this thought last week outside a Nome Common Council executive session on the issue.

"They are planning to build a 21st century building on a 1905 Nome township plat," Ivanoff said of the pieced together downtown site.

The city's plan involving Sitnasuak would remove the need for the state to be a land broker. Instead, Sitnasuak, as major landholder, would work out the deal with West and Sackett.

However, a rumor persists that payment to Sackett and West for their land would involve trading of favorable land elsewhere.

The Department of Administration did not immediately return a phone call Monday. It was unknown whether there were any other responses to the request for letters of interest. It is likely that any responses regarded as feasible would have to go to the Department of Justice for a ruling on the noncompetitive procurement issue.

KNOM's new path will sound a lot like its old one

By Tyler Rhodes

Surrounded by a small group of visitors, Ric Schmidt unsheathed the old 45 rpm record and gave a short primer to the younger members in the tour how the small wax disc produced music.

As he began to usher the group into the next room full of CDs, the KNOM general manager pointed to 8-tracks and even a reel-to-reel player tucked away on a shelf. The abundance of relics from the recording industry helped give away the radio station's age and seemed a fitting aspect to include during KNOM's July 14 birthday celebration.

For the celebration, the Nome-based radio station opened its doors all day July 14 to the community for tours, snacks, birthday cake and some reminiscing over the station's 39-year history. The party, however, wasn't entirely dedicated to looking back; it was as much about KNOM's future as it was its past.

The open house came in the midst of the radio station's transition from one owner to another as a newly formed nonprofit organization gradually takes over KNOM from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska headquartered in Fairbanks. "The covers come off it today," Schmidt said.

The new organization, Alaska Radio Mission-KNOM, essentially puts KNOM in charge of KNOM. While Schmidt said the radio station has always enjoyed a large amount of autonomy, the new organization will put all the control, decision-making and management in the hands of nonprofit. Schmidt said eventually a seven-member board of directors will oversee the organization.

The legal separation of the radio station from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska comes as a result of the bishop's reorganization under bankruptcy protection. The bishop is required to pay out millions of dollars under a settlement with victims of sexual abuse by clergy and church workers. In addition to the changes at KNOM, the bankruptcy has resulted in the sale of Pilgrim Hot Springs to a consortium of area Native corporations and organizations.

Breaking ties with the bishop does not come free for the new organization. The July 14 birthday party also served as a kick-off of the nonprofit's effort to raise $1 million to cover the costs of acquiring the property, equipment, radio license and intellectual property from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska.

KNOM has always run off donations, mostly from donors who live outside the state. Schmidt said the new nonprofit will maintain that model. "It's not going to be easy," Schmidt said. "It would have been easier five years ago in that economy." Schmidt said once the nonprofit owns the station outright it will cost approximately $1.2 million a year to operate.

Schmidt said he realizes that most people living in the region do not have the means to donate to the station. "We understand most people in this region can't give us a dime," he said. He suggested, however, if people want to help support the station in other manners, they can write a letter of support, telling what the station has meant to them. Such letters, he said. can be invaluable when approaching potential donors or granting agencies.

Broadcasting on both AM and FM frequencies, KNOM provides an eclectic mix of programming. Music of nearly all varieties is mingled with local news, weather reports and personal messages sent over the airwaves. Alaska Native songs and drumming can be heard following an inspirational message or a locally hosted music show dedicated to a specific genre. When the Iditarod and snowmachine races roll through town, KNOM volunteers and reporters are out at all hours to deliver results and interview racers. "The people are wonderful who are listening. The volunteers are wonderful. The staff is wonderful. There's a large drive by the people here to serve the community," Schmidt said.

The station's on-air personalities are largely volunteers who receive housing and a small stipend during their year or two of service. Many of the volunteers end up staying and creating a life for themselves in Nome.

Schmidt said the change in ownership should not change the programming nor the manner in which the station is run.

For more information on the radio station's transition to new ownership or making a donation, the station can be contacted at (907) 443-5221.

Uranium

Uranium is naturally occurring in the earth's crust and not unheard of on the Seward Peninsula. Deposits have been eyed approximately 180 miles to the southeast near Elim by a mining corporation. While the presence of uranium in Wales' water system appears to be an anomaly for Alaska, it is not uncommon in other parts of the nation. Many states' health departments have readily available literature advising residents who encounter above-normal levels of the element in their wells.

Information sampled from those departments note that treatment systems can be employed to decrease the uranium levels. Most recommended are reverse-osmosis filters that prevent uranium from passing through or ion exchange systems that replace uranium with a safer compound. Health departments report bathing and showering in uraniumcontaminated water is not a health concern since it is not absorbed through the skin.

Such filtrations systems cost anywhere from a few hundred to a few thousand dollars at Lower-48 prices and are not the type of thing one would find on the shelf of the Wales Native Store. Bottled water in the village goes for nearly $3 per 20ounce container.

Village Safe Water's Phillips said a household charcoal filter would help reduce the level of uranium in the water. He also said sand filters that were used with the previous public water system could be put back online quickly to treat the water.

The wells in question are approximately 60 feet deep and are used once a year to fill the community's 500,000-gallon tank. The village's school, clinic and washeteria are all served by water lines from the tank. Residents in the village get water from their homes by filling up tanks at the washeteria, Crisci said. "Pretty much the whole village uses the water," he said.

Before the wells were brought online, the village collected surface water for its needs. Crisci said the water needed to be treated to the extent that the process was damaging the pipes. "It was eating up the plumbing," he said. "We get away from the surface water and we run right into uranium."

Crisci said his concern goes beyond those who are currently in the village. He noted that several people come through the village, whether they are working with the school, power utility or other entity. "What we are trying to do is inform people who might have come here and used this water," Crisci said. "We are trying to also notify them, 'Hey you have been drinking this water, this is what we've got.' Phillips said his first job in Wales was to be testing the water at several points to determine where the uranium is entering the supply. He said the previous tests were all conducted at one point. He said both wells would be tested, as well as the surface of the water in the tank and where the water exits the tank. "The lab here in Anchorage can turn around the one test for uranium in a week," he said. "Once we get a reading on that, that's going to tell us a lot."

Phillips said one of the readings that was attributed to uranium could have actually been caused by potassium-40, a radioactive isotope of potassium. "If it's...from potassium-40, then it's harmless and acceptable because it's naturally occurring," he said.

Phillips suspects that the source of the uranium would be naturally occurring given the location of the wells about one mile outside of the village. "There should be no human influence on that water. It's pristine tundra, rocky ground," he said. "As far as I know it has never been disturbed except for a road that goes to Tin City. At 60 feet there shouldn't be any influence from surface water."

With the state of his village's wells in question, Mayor Crisci laments that surface water can no longer be used to supply the community. "There're alternatives (to the well) at this point—one is contaminated with fish, the other is yellow," Crisci said of the surface water sources previously used. "The problem is you have to have good rain to wash it out.'

WHITE ALICE ARRIVES (above)—In mid-1950s the White Alice station whose antennas still stand on Anvil Mountain came to Nome's jetty piece by piece. The USAF assigned construction to Bell System's Western Electric Co. Personnel from U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and construction trades also earned high wages from the project.

BUILT TO LAST (left)—Interior reinforcements of White Alice shown under construction during the 1950s have helped keep White Alice towers standing on Anvil Mountain north of town. Before wiring and equipment was stripped, the towers weighed around 100 tons. Most White Alice Communications installations throughout the state have been demolished.

By Sandra L. Medearis

White Alice towers have stood on Anvil Mountain since their completion in 1958. The curved antennas once belonged to a chain of quadruple sets that stretched across remote mountains and flatlands to carry military and civilian messages even before Alaska became a state. Before then, people in remote areas had to make appointments to use the phone.

This week the towers were still standing, but future issues of The Nome Nugget may show photos of the demolition process. Sitnasuak Native Corp. is in line to receive the land from the U.S. Air Force. Before that can happen the site must be cleared of contaminants to meet satisfaction of the federal Bureau of Land Management, the clearing-house for Alaska Native land claims.

The USAF subcontractors recently began clearing the PCBs from the soil. However, the back panels of the towers are contaminated by Glassbestos, a type of insulation combining glass and asbestos, according to an analysis conducted by USAF. The City of Nome has a cell in the landfill rated for disposal of the Glassbestos. Friends of White Alice are hoping for a solution that would have the USAF discard the Glassbestos-laden antenna covers locally under a program that cleans Formerly Used Defense Sites and use the avoided shipping costs to cover the antenna backs with safe material. A satisfactory solution to this contamination could save the towers and get them past the BLM contamination standards depending People from Nome and Lower 48 who treasure relics of history want to see White Alice survive.

on whether SNC found maintenance costs feasible thereafter. Last week, Trudy Sobocienski, CEO of SNC, extended to July 21 the drop-dead day of decision on the towers' fate.

Samuelson, Carrie M. McLain Memorial museum director, said. "We should appreciate and remember the efforts of those who built this town and this state."

The White Alice network, conceived by Bell Telephone Laboratories engineers in 1954, answered the need for a modern communications system to serve civilian and military needs to get messages through static and all weather conditions. The military relied on White Alice connections as an early warning system in event of Soviet attack.

BTL engineers recommended a new technology that used a "feed horn" in front of the antenna to spray a radio signal containing many telephone conversations and telegraph messages against the curved surface of the antenna which then beamed it toward the horizon. A very small fraction of the signal would survive and then bounce down off a layer of atmosphere surrounding the earth called the troposphere. An antenna at the next White Alice station would pick up the signal, amplify it, and bounce it on its way to the person waiting at the end of the circuit. The two pairs of antennas stood in opposite directions to catch and forward messages coming and going.

The stations used a large amount of electrical power to get their messages across. White Alice station on Anvil Mountain, designated AVM on system maps, generated all its own power, according to Stan Harhut of Anchorage, boss of the station for most of his 22 years on the mountain.

Some of the antennas looked like

Nome's, like huge drive-in movie screens, standing 60 feet high and weighing up to 100 tons. Nowadays Nome's antennas are shell-like remnants with guts removed and copper wiring scavenged.

The White Alice system of 33 stations at intervals of up to 200 miles covered 3,100 miles of routes during the Cold War. The telecommunications system was a part of Alaska's defense industry valued at $300 million annually in the late 1950s and early 1960s, according to documents published by telecommunications industry.

The White Alice antennas brought communication to remote villages in Alaska. Alaskans liked to talk. Almost the heaviest phone users in the nation in 1959, Alaskans averaged 550 conversations over that year, above the average in the Lower 48 states but behind Hawaiians. But before White Alice came to stand on Anvil Mountain, a resident of Nome wanting to make a long distance call had to make a reservation to use one of two circuits out of town. White Alice boosted that number to a whopping 15 circuits and expanded the opportunity for chitchat. Whoo-

A magic hiking trip to Dorothy Falls

By Nadja Roessek

Folks don't need "ruby slippers" to get to Dorothy Falls; but the beautiful, easy hike is a worthwhile scenic trip.

The hike starts approximately at Mile 24 on the Kougarok Road. The round trip distance is about 4 miles and requires the crossing of the Nome River. After the river crossing the hike leads uphill, gaining about 700 feet. The climber is rewarded with a breathtaking view of the surrounding hills.

After hiking along the mountain ridge one can see Dorothy Falls on the right in the river valley. A steep trail leads down to the falls which requires some experience and safe walking.

The return hike along Dorothy Creek, which is slippery on some spots, goes past the remains of a siphon on the Miocene Ditch. The Miocene ditch was completed in 1904 and the siphon was used to carry water across the valley to the ditch, which carried water to the gold fields outside of Nome. The water was used for hydraulic mining. Please note: Grizzly bears can be encountered in this area and caution is advised.

Norton Sound commercial fishers target silver salmon starting July 26

Courtesy of Alaska Dept. of Fish and

The Norton Sound staff of the Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game extends condolences to the family of Tom Sagoonick, who lost his life July 16 while commercial fishing in the Shaktoolik subdistrict. (See story on page 4.)

The following report of Norton Sound fisheries activities through July 16 was provided by Jim Menard, ADF&G area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue. The figures do not include catches for the fishing period that ended July 17.

This is the last week of commercial chum salmon fishing in Norton Sound for 2010. The ADF&G will switch to coho salmon management beginning July 26. This week's commercial fishing scheduled is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday for the Golovin, Elim, Norton Bay, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet subdistricts. Nets are limited to 100 fathoms in aggregate length and stretch mesh measure is restricted to 6 inches or less.

Crabbers have harvested all 30,000 pounds of the Community Development Quota in the Norton Sound commercial red king crab fishery. The catch in the open access fishery totaled 50,000 pounds of the 370,000-pound crab quota through July 16. Currently 23 fishermen are registered for the open access fishery.

Unalakleet subdistrict

Subsistence fishing nets in marine waters are restricted to 6 inches or less stretched mesh. Net fishing and beach seining are allowed in marine waters 7 days a week. Any king salmon caught in beach seines must be immediately released.

Subsistence fishing nets are restricted to 4-1/2 inches or less stretched mesh in the Unalakleet River. Net fishing and beach seining are allowed 7 days a week. Any king salmon caught in beach seines must be immediately released.

Sport fishing for king salmon is closed in the Unalakleet River and the use of bait is prohibited. Any king salmon incidentally hooked while targeting other fish species must be immediately released.

Commercial catches total 72 kings, 12,104 chums, 8,390 pinks, 12 sockeyes and 11 silvers for 30 permit holders. The chum catches have been well above av-

Catches at the Unalakleet River Test Fish project through July 16 were 38 kings, 1,003 chums and 603 pinks. The chum catch ranks second best in the project's 26-year project history. The average third quarter point for the run is July 27. Historically the 99 percent point for king salmon test net catches is July 16. The king catch is only one-half of the recent 10-year average, and only 2002 and 2003 had lower king catches than this year in the past decade. The pink catch is lagging well behind at less than half the even-year average. It ranks 9th out of 13 even-numbered years in the project's history. The average third-quarter point is July 16. ADF&G operates the project with assistance from Norton Sound Eco-Development (NSEDC).

Escapement goals at the North River Tower are kings, 1,200-2,600; chums, no goals established; pinks 25,000; and silvers, 550-1,100 (aerial survey goal). Cumulative counts through July 16 were 258 kings, 6,030 chums and 93,510 pinks. Kings are about one-quarter of the recent 5 and 10-year averages for this date. The average third quarter point is

No escapement goals have been estab-lished for the new Unalakleet River floating weir. Cumulative counts at the weir through July 16 were 536 kings, 36,438 chums and 499,101 pinks. The weir is a cooperative project of ADF&G, the Native Village of Unalakleet, the U.S. Bureau of Land Management and NSEDC. Major funding for the project was provided by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service Office of Subsistence Management.

Shaktoolik subdistrict

Subsistence fishing nets in marine waters of the Shaktoolik subdistrict are restricted to 6 inches or less stretched mesh measure. Net fishing and beach seining in marine waters are allowed 7 days a week. Any king salmon caught in beach seines must be immediately released. Beach seining is allowed in the Shaktoolik River 7 days a week, and any king salmon caught in beach seines must be immediately released.

Sport fishing for king salmon is closed in the Shaktoolik River, and the use of bait is prohibited. Any king salmon incidentally hooked while targeting other fish species must be immediately released.

Commercial catches totaled 4 kings, 24,841 chums, 6,787 pinks, 5 sockeyes and 3 silvers for 22 permit holders.

Norton Bay subdistrict

Commercial catches totaled 2,446 chums and 1,260 pinks for 4 permit holders. The chum catches have been above average.

Elim subdistrict

Commercial catches totaled 1 king, 16,572 chums and 7,334 pinks for 19 permit holders. The chum catches are well above average.

Escapement goals at the Kwiniuk River Tower are 300-550 kings; 11,500-23,000 chums; 8,400 pinks; and 650-1,300 silvers (aerial survey goal). Cumulative counts through July 16 are 108 kings, 56,217 chums and 400,534 pinks. King counts are one-half the recent 5-year average and one-third the recent 10-year average. The average 90% point is July 20. Chum counts are the second highest in the 46-year project history for this date. The average 90 percent point is July 19. The cumulative count through July 16 was 297 sockeyes, 941 chums and 3,451 pinks. The sockeye and chum counts are the second worst since the weir project started in 2003, and the pink salmon count is the second worst for an even year since the project began. The commercial harvest in the Kotzebue district totaled 9,253 chums for 15 fishermen in the first week of fishing, which opened July 12. The catch and effort were average for the first week. The commercial fishing schedule is Monday from 12 p.m. to 8 p.m. and Tuesday through Saturday from 6 a.m. to 2 p.m. The buyer, Great Pacific, may shorten the fleet's hours and may not buy some days during the peak weeks of fishing due to capacity concerns. Do you know your medication's side effects?

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

I remember reading a B.C. comic years ago in which Johnny Hart gives this advice through one of his prehistoric sages: "Never take a medication that has more side effects than you have symptoms."

This advice has merit, especially given the ever-growing list of new medications and the endless advertising to get you to ask your doctor about this or that new drug.

Every medication has certain risks, or side effects, that must be weighed against the benefits of taking the drug. Acetaminophen (Tylenol), for example, may cause liver problems. But these effects are rare in otherwise healthy people, and therefore the benefits of taking acetaminophen for a disease like osteoarthritis usually outweigh the risks in most people.

Sometimes the risk of taking a medication outweighs the benefit. A few years ago, the drug company Merck withdrew one of its most popular arthritis medications, rofecoxib (Vioxx), because the medication was found to increase the risk of heart attacks in long-term users. The Food and Drug Administration is currently evaluating whether a diabetes drug called rosiglitazone (Avandia) should be removed from the market for the same reason. Avandia helps lower the blood sugar in people with diabetes, but several studies show it increases the risk of heart attacks, heart disease related-deaths, and

Most of the time, the risk-benefit balance of a drug is not clearly tilted one way or the other. The American Heart Association recently stated that the benefit of taking a daily aspirin to reduce the risk of a heart attack is only worth the risk of gastrointestinal bleeding if a person's overall risk of cardiovascular disease is elevated above ten percent. Therefore the risks and benefits of most medications, like aspirin, must be weighed individually in light of each patient's overall health.

To whatever extent possible, every patient should become an expert regarding their prescription medications and weigh the benefits against the risks. This is true whether the medication is for a temporary problem or a life-long chronic disorder.

Pharmaceutical manufacturers are required to be upfront about a drug's effects, both good and bad. The fine print often provides important details about whether or not taking a medication is a good idea.

You may have noticed a commercial for a popular drug for people at risk of heart disease that lowers triglycerides and raises HDL (good) cholesterol. The advertisement concludes with a disclaimer that the medication has a long list of side effects and in the end does not lower the risk of heart attack or stroke. The point is that medicines like this may make your lab work look better, but the fine print reveals serious side effects that may not be worth the risk if the medication does not change your risk of serious disease.

Learning about your medications does not have to be complicated. In the past, researching a medication took hours in a library. Now the Internet provides an amazing amount of easily accessed information regarding medications and their side effects. One of favorite sites medlineplus.gov. It provides nonproprietary information collected by trusted sources like the Mayo Clinic, the American Academy of Family Medicine, and the National Institutes of Health.

It is also important to check for adverse drug interactions when you are prescribed more than one medication at a time or if you take over-the-counter medications. Again, the Internet provides several sites that help you compare the possible effects of interactions between various medications.

Your provider or local pharmacist can also review your medication list for any possible adverse interactions

Reading about your medications and their side effects will no doubt lead to many questions. Your medical provider can help you sift through this information and weigh the benefits and risks of taking certain drugs. Learning about your medications takes time; but remember that your health is an investment. Just like any investment, you must ensure the benefits outweigh the risk.

Elections General Information The right to vote is one that we Alaskans sometimes take for granted. Alaska Natives and Native Americans were denied the right to vote longer than any other community in the United States. It wasn't until 1924 that Congress extended citizenship to all indigenous peoples in the United States. Here's some history to share: William Paul Sr. (May 7, 1885 – March 4, 1977) was the first Native elected to the Alaska Territorial Legislature in 1924. Paul was an attorney, legislator, and political activist from the Tlingit nation of southeast Alaska. He was a recognized leader in the Alaska Native Brotherhood. William Paul was the first Alaska Native to become an attorney, the first to be elected to Alaska's House of Representatives, and the first to serve as an officer in the federal Bureau of Indian Affairs. He helped draft the legislation that adopted Alaska's flag in 1927. Among many other efforts, he also played a major role in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act (ANCSA) of 1971.

Although our communities make up a smaller percentage of the statewide population, each vote is critical. For instance, the 2000 Presidential election was decided by an extremely narrow margin. George W. Bush won the state of Florida by just 537 votes, making him the next President of the United States. Close to 6 million voters went to the polls in Florida. Another example is in the 2006 Democratic primary election in Alaska District 37. The race between Carl Moses and Bryce Edgmon ended in a tie, ultimately requiring a coin toss that decided the race. Edgmon has served in the Alaska House of Representatives since. Just a reminder— the last day to register to vote or update your voter registration is Sunday, July 25, 2010 to be able to vote in the August 24 Primary Election. If you've moved, or would like to change your party affiliation, now is the time to do so. You can check your voter registration status at the Division of Elecwebsite: http://www.elections.alaska.gov/inde x.php. In order to register, a current and valid state ID card or birth certificate is required. Tribal ID cards are not accepted by the State as valid identification. To apply for a state ID card, visit the DMV website at http://doa.alaska.gov/dmv/.

I'd also like to mention that a bill I sponsored will be on the General Election ballot this year. Senate Joint Resolution 21 "Increase Number of Legislators and Districts" is scheduled to be Ballot Measure 1 in November. This Act will amend the Alaska Constitution to increase the number of state legislators from 60 to 66. Six new legislative districts will be created as a result, adding 4 representatives and 2 senators to the Legislature. The changes proposed by the Act will become effective after a new redistricting plan is adopted following the 2010 federal

Inuit Circumpolar Council Conference in Greenland

My wife Willow and I were honored to attend the 11th General Assembly of the Inuit Circumpolar Council in Nuuk, Greenland from June 25 – July 3. We joined over one hundred fellow Alaskans representing the North Slope, the Northwest Arctic, Bering Strait and AVCP regions of Alaska. The ICC, formed by the late Eben Hopson, Sr. of Barrow in 1977, creates a forum to promote Inuit interests and rights at the international level. ICC member include Greenland, countries Canada, Russia (Chukotka) and the United States (Alaska).

Also at the conference were Representative Reggie Joule and Representative Neal Foster. We met with the Greenland government's Ministry of Fisheries, Hunting, and Agriculture to hear about the country's management of fish and game. In Greenland, hunters gather for subsistence purposes and also sell the wild fish and game in grocery stores and local fish and meat markets in downtown Nuuk.

We enjoyed listening to the speeches and presentations of the many presenters including Mayor Edward Itta from the North Slope Borough, Carl Weisner, Vice President of the Northwest Arctic Borough Assembly, and Marie Greene, President of NANA Corporation, who delivered a speech via video conferencing. Her address on NANA's involvement in resource development on the Inuit homeland was inspiring.

During the conference, Aqqaluk Lynge of Greenland was elected as the Chair of the ICC and will serve a four-year term. Lynge has served at ICC since its creation in 1977 in a variety of leadership roles including former Chair of ICC. Appointed to nell said. "These bills will give prosecutors additional tools to punish and hold accountable those convicted of alcohol-related crimes."

In an effort to combat bootlegging, Representative Jay Ramras sponsored a bill that brings bootlegging penalties in line with those for DUI penalties and ensures that those convicted for repeat minor consuming offenses will receive the appropriate penalties. Additionally, two bills affecting the State Alcoholic Beverage Control Board were signed by the Governor. Senate Bill 261, sponsored by myself, adds a rural seat to the board. I feel that it is important to have rural representation on the State ABC in statewide policy making efforts. Having a rural seat on this board will allow for a direct exchange of communication between rural and urban viewpoints when it comes to alcohol regulations. Senator Kevin Meyer sponsored an additional two bills. One bill extends the State ABC to June 30, 2011 and the other, increasescivil damages for the purchase of alcohol for minors. The bill encourages licensees to continue enforcement of underage drinking laws.

Also signed was a resolution that will designate September 9, 2010 as Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorders Awareness Day to promote awareness of the effects of prenatal exposure to alcohol.

Update on Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Assault

The Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual Assault is accepting applications for its Third annual LeadOn! for Peace and Equality Youth Leadership conference. It is a 3-day youth planned and led minisummit for youth across Alaska. This is an opportunity to inspire, share, and plan for youth-led efforts that promote nonviolence in relationships and healthy communities. More than 120 youth and adults attend this event and prepare for planning projects in their home community. Through DHSS-Women's Children's and Family Health we were able to offer funding for Lead On! youth and other communities to carry out projects in their home communities. To learn more about the summit and to download a 2010 application visit: http://www.andvsa.org/?page_id=53

The Alaska Network on Domestic Violence and Sexual assault is comprised of 18 member programs spanning the state of Alaska providing a wide range of services to women, children, and men who are victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. Those services include immediate safety, shelter, legal advocacy, crisis counseling, job training, housing assistance, medical accompaniments, intervention services to perpetrators of domestic violence, training and technical assistance for first responders to these crimes. community education to citizens interested in ending violence against women and children, and evidencebased primary prevention strategies to shift social norms in our homes, schools, and communities. Please visit their website www.andvsa.org for more information. It is a great resource for statistics, contact information for their member program for individuals seeking services, and the Network's training, legal advocacy, public policy and prevention programs.

AEA Seeks Qualified Applicants for Round IV Grants

The Alaska Energy Authority is soliciting competitive grant applications from qualified applicants for renewable energy projects to be funded by the Alaska State Legislature. The Round IV application period opens July 21. AEA must receive Round IV applications no later than 5:00 PM Wednesday, September 15, 2010.

In 2008, the Alaska Legislature established the Renewable Energy Fund and authorized AEA to administer procedures for awarding the grants and distributing grant funds. AEA received more than 350 Rounds I, II and III applications, which were thoroughly evaluated in accordance with criteria set forth in the legislation. Following AEA's recommendations, the Legislature approved 129 Round I, Round II and Round III renewable energy projects totaling $150 million.

AEA is seeking to recommend projects based on applications that clearly demonstrate a public benefit from the proposed project. From Round IV applications received, AEA will make project recommendations to the Legislature for FY2012 funding.

Beginning July 21, a new link to the Round IV web page is available from AEA's home page, www.akenergyauthority.org. The link will access the Request for Application, application forms and all supporting information. Applicants may also contact Renewable Energy Fund Grants Administrator Butch White by e-mail at re_fund@aidea.org, or telephone (907) 771-3048.

This year marks the second Renewable Energy Fund construction season. Seven projects across Alaska were completed and twenty additional projects are scheduled for completion this year. For the first $125 million appropriated in Rounds I and II, 97 grants to successful applicants are in place. AEA expects to have Round III grants in place in early July. Funds are disbursed to grantees as work proceeds and invoices are submitted to the Authority.

NJUS five-year sewer, water plans set

By Sandra L. Medearis

Nome Joint Utility System board members have approved a plan that will direct the extension and upgrades of sewer and water services over the next five years.

The plan, put before the panel at a meeting July 20, looks at the current system and predicts growth and resources to order capital projects expected to total $27.7 million. "We have a to-do list. The sequence could be impacted by other federal or private projects," John K. Handeland, utility manager said. He added that the plan schedule itself had been driven in part by the need to have solid plans to back up funding applications due to state agencies in Au-

NJUS has been working from a 2004 update of the 1996 five-year plan. Contract planners used a predicted one-percent-per-year growth rate in designing plans for the 20year life of proposed sanitation improvements. Based on the state demographer's estimate, Nome had a population of 3,468 in 2009. Using a growth of one-percent per year, estimates show Nome with 3,681 in 2015 and in 2030, 4,274 people.

Top priority work will be in full swing next summer-first phase multi-million dollar project to replace failing, direct buried "Sclaircore" water and sewer piping installed on the east side of Nome in the early 1980s. Sclaircore? That's pre-insulated heat-traced pipe. This work will extend through 2014. The project also involves rebuilding the Sixth Avenue Pump House.

This summer crews are working along Nome Bypass to hook up the new hospital. Overhead work has finished. Now the operation has gone underground with a horizontal directional drill crew helping NJUS get a length of the hospital service buried. The utility is negotiating agreements with state Dept. of Transportation to let work get underway to reroute lines in preparation for a new, rerouted Snake River Bridge. The horizontal directional drill, just arrived on the most recent barge, will bore beneath the river channel near both the existing and proposed Snake River bridges as the least disruptive approach to replacing utilities currently suspended under the old bridge. With minimal disruption in existing routing, no cost of operation or additional freeze protection requirements will be necessary, according to analysis by CE 2 planning engineers. Expected to be finished in 2011, the utility relocation cost estimate is $2.3 million. Year 2011 work projects have a projected cost of $6.13 million. In 2012, the plan calls for continued work, Phase II, of east Nome water and sewer replacement and expansion; a water and sewer telemetry system to insure secure security and allow monitoring and control of selected facilities and system elements: identification of a new water source-drill test wells, get site control, and design a transmission line from the source to a connection with the existing system. The total for proposed 2012 construction season: $4.5 million

In 2013, the work will continue to Phase III east Nome water and sewer replacement and expansion; Seppala

Dear Editor:

The word for today and every day for the rest of our lives is love! An individual cannot be brought into this world without pure love. Pure love is what you feel when protecting a toddler from harm.

The lack of honest self love keeps people from progressing forward. Love helps the individual become who he/she was meant to be, a value creator.

We did not become who we are overnight. Through time we became who we are today. Visionary Mark Hamilton, founder of the Neothink® Society said, "Honesty requires love, so we all should start from there." Through time we will have this honest love of self.

RE: School security proposal gets wrong reception, July 8, 2010 Dear Editor,

I am a retired schoolteacher after having taught at Gambell, Fairbanks, Nome Community Center and Shishmaref. I agree with Superintendent Jon Wehde, you know what you are doing. Keep up the good work, money is well spent when it is used for students. Money is not well spent when it is spent for his/her own gain, or taking money from the people they serve or work with— such as taking earned income from co-workers by using their position.

I worked with Jon and know his concern for the students. In most schools (urban or rural) there are one or two students who tend to bully younger students. Some parents tend to protect their children without knowing how bullying affects other students. It must be hard to understand how students behave when one hasn't had teaching experience. Surveillance cameras do not violate a student's privacy. They help the teacher to better control the students for a better education and to protect others around them. Parents need to support students and teachers. We (teachers) are here to help you raise your students properly.

The way we think and behave changes with time. We cannot be held captive in one period of time. Our children behave differently then when we were young. A leader has

The Check is in the Mail

As sure as "The check is in the mail" is one of our most noted business phrase, it will be in the mail even longer if the Postal Service has its way. The US Postal Service is losing money and in all its wisdom has decided to do something about it— they will raise prices and cut service.

The communities of western Alaska rely heavily on the mail. We are isolated and off the road system. We need a reliable well-managed postal service that can make good decisions that benefit its employees and its customers. Sure, the economy is bad, but the USPS has made a poor move in raising the price of postage and cutting the days of service. This places too heavy of a burden on the customers. Nomeites complain that a letter mailed to a business across the street in town must go from Nome to Anchorage and then back to Nome. Does this sound like a very efficient way to deliver a letter? We also have to cope with the Sarbanes-Oxley (sounds like sour beans) antiterrorism requirement, which says that mail must be delivered to the air carrier several hours before the plane takes off. So, mail delivered to Nome's Postal Annex at 8:30 a.m. can't go out of Nome on Alaska flight 151 or 152. Instead it has to go out on flight 153 at night. This adds another day to the delivery cycle. This does not make the sender or the intended receiver happy.

The Postal Service has been conducting field hearings around the country to find out how folks feel about the cut to a five-day service. They avoided Alaska and Hawaii. Go figure! The Postal Regulatory Commission will make a recommendation to Congress and a decision will be made by Congress before September 30. We need to get our Congressional delegation to do their best to help the Postal Service restructure and pull out of their downward spiral of fewer customers, less service and longer delivery time. The USPS in western Alaska is western Alaska's business and social and business lifeline. Let's not cut if

Federal judge's Chukchi Sea lease ruling draws criticism

The federal court last week ruled that the Interior Department had failed to follow environmental laws before selling drilling rights to Shell in the Arctic waters of the Chukchi Sea. The ruling drew flak from state officials and Senator Mark Begich. Gov. Sean Parnell said the judge's findings were troubling. But he says he now plans to press the federal government to get its "act together" and to do things right. Begich said that it's unfortunate that many decisions about resource development in Alaska get so polarized that they end up being decided by judges instead of through an open and balanced public process. Begich plans to meet with the director of the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, Regulation and Enforcement to explain how development can occur safely in Alaska's Arctic waters.

Sen. Murkowski pushes mining for rare earth elements

U.S. Senators Lisa Murkowski and Evan Bayh, D-Indiana, teamed up to send a letter to Secretary of the Energy Department Steven Chu with the message to speed up loan guarantee applications to rebuild America's rare earth supply chain and manufacturing sector. Murkowski said that China accounts for 97 percent of global rare earth production, and she maintains that China has held clean energy manufacturing "hostage" by limiting exports. Rare earths are a group of 17 elements vital to modern defense and clean energy technologies, including radar systems, modern weaponry, advanced batteries, next-generation vehicles, high-efficiency lighting and wind turbines

Washington ok's hydrographic surveys in Arctic

Last week the U.S. House of Representatives passed the Hydrographic Services Improvement Act with a vote of 420-0. Rep. Don Young sponsored the act. Young said that abundant and accurate data to support safe navigation is needed to use "changing Arctic conditions to our advantage.

The bill authorizes funds for hy-drographic surveys and Continental Shelf mapping of the Arctic region. It was part of a three-bill package introduced by Congressman Young in the 111th Congress to address the effect changing Arctic conditions will have on commerce, resource development, tourism and safe navigation of Arctic waters.

Newspaper associations fight proposed postal rate hike

The National Newspaper Association and an alliance of almost 700 companies using the U.S. mail to deliver their products, cried foul when the postal service requested a major postage rate increase to the Postal Regulatory Commission. The alliance of newspaper and magazine publishers said that the U.S. Postal Service should not be permitted to hike rates beyond inflation. The Postal Service in July requested an "exigent" rate increase, beyond levels permitted by inflation-capped federal laws. It seeks rate increases to go in effect in January that can be as high as 10 percent for some newspaper mail, and that average around 5.6 percent. The postal service argued that it needed the extra money because of the effects of recession and the impact of the Internet upon the mail. NNA's President Cheryl Kaechele said that small business jobs are at stake as postage is the major distribution expense for most community newspapers.

Rain floods strand motorists on Taylor Highway

State officials took inventory of the damage left by record rainfalls last week near the Taylor Highway. Public Safety Commissioner Joseph Masters, commissioner of the Department of Military and Veterans Affairs Maj. Gen. Thomas Katkus and Governor Parnell landed in the community of Eagle, at the end of Taylor highway. Floods closed about 10 miles of the highway and Alaska State Troopers had to rescue stranded motorists. The Division of Homeland Security and Emergency Management was put in close contact with community leaders. They are preparing a report to the Disaster Policy Cabinet for a potential state disaster declaration. The state Department of Transportation has begun road repairs, but has advised that it could take several weeks to reopen the Taylor Highway.

Nomeite reappointed to Natural Resources Conservation and Development Board

Nome's Cheryl Thompson has been reappointed to the Natural Resources Conservation and Development Board. The five-member board is composed of land users and makes recommendations to the commissioner of the Department of Natural Resources on matters relating to conservation and development of Alaska's non-game resources. Thompson has owned a gardening business in Nome since 1984. She taught sub-Arctic horticulture and gardening as an adjunct instructor at UAF's Northwest Campus and at the University's Cooperative Extension Service in Nome. She organized, led and hosted the Nome Garden Tour from 2003 to 2007. Thompson was appointed to a seat reserved for a resident of Northwest Alaska or the Arctic.

Feeling out Pebble

The Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Lisa Jackson and other EPA officials are traveling in Alaska this week. This marks Jackson's first trip to Alaska as EPA administrator. She is beginning her trip in Anchorage to meet with Alaska Dept. of Environmental Conservation, Alaska Conservation Alliance, Resource Development Council, Alaska Oil and Gas Association, and the U.S. Coast Guard. The Tundra Drums reports Jackson is meeting with the Pebble Partnership Ltd. EPA officials say Jackson wants to meet with Alaskan communities and Native villages as well as business and government leaders to hear their concerns on the Alaska environment. Jackson also traveling to Bethel, Kasigluk, Napakiak, Chefornak, and Dillingham to meet with communities, local and tribal governments and tribal associations. In Dillingham, Jackson scheduled a listening session for local and regional stakeholders on the proposed Pebble Mine project. Other EPA officials are scheduled to meet with the North Slope Borough and tribal governments in Barrow.

Port and harbor development

to proceed with recommendations in the plan, including timelines and possible funding sources.

Port projects prioritized

Harbormaster Joy Baker conveyed a request from Garth Howlett of PND Engineers to the Port Commission to prioritize the proposed port projects he is studying and designing. The commission ranked four projects in this order: (1) New high mast lighting, (2) a third dock at the new causeway; (3) barge ramp expansion, and (4) fender repairs.

Baker provided a written synopsis of each project to the commission. She said Howlett has nearly completed the high mast lighting design the port will use to seek construction funding. He is updating his firm's 2007 preliminary design for high mast lighting and revising the cost estimate. Nome Joint Utility System will work with Electrical Power Systems to provide a design and cost estimate to upgrade the existing power service on the causeway.

Baker said a third dock is becoming necessary due to increased traffic from foreign and domestic research vessels, oil research support vessels, U.S. Coast Guard ships on shore leave and numerous equipment barges. "We are consistently seeing fuel and cargo traffic on the outer cell, with constant gravel rotating out of the inner cell," she wrote.... "PND will look into the feasibility and costs of both installing sheet pile from the City Dock to the West Gold Dock and building a third, separate dock between them.'

The barge ramp is heavily used by vessels that load and unload gravel and cargo for villages in the region, Baker noted. "When one of the larger vessels is at the ramp, it is difficult to trailer out a smaller vessel that needs maintenance," she wrote. Signs of material loss are evident beneath the existing concrete ramp, causing a slight dip in the structure. Baker said PND has suggested building an identical ramp on the north side of the existing ramp to use while the original ramp is repaired and to provide additional landing space.

Fender repairs are needed at the east and south SBH docks. Fenders installed by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers (USACE) at the east SBH dock are failing due to their light duty capacity, Baker reports. She said PND will outline options and associated costs for modifying existing fenders or replacing them with fender piles similar to those at the fish dock and low level dock.

Fenders at the south SBH dock appear to be functioning properly with minimal ice damage, but they are too short for safe moorage during a rising tide and boats are getting caught beneath the fender bottom, Baker said. "We currently have a set of identical fenders on hand that were discarded during construction," she noted. "PND will finalize the design based on a USACE sketch, identify a scope of work and assist with putting the project out to bid for fall time construction."

Marine pilots' request nixed

The Port Commission unanimously decided to take no stand on a request from the Alaska Marine Pilots LLC to support a proposal to greatly expand the waters covered by the State of Alaska's compulsory pilotage law to include waters seaward of the existing pilotage area out to 200 nautical miles or more off the coast of Alaska into the Chukchi Sea and Beaufort Sea. Compulsory marine pilotage is currently limited to waters within three miles of Alaska's

Capt. Peter S. Garay, president of Alaska Marine Pilots, requested a letter of support for expanding the boundaries of compulsory marine pilotage in a letter dated Feb. 25, 2010 to Mayor Denise Michels. Garay argues that a marine pilot should be aboard vessels conducting oil and gas exploration in the Chukchi and Beaufort Seas in his paper titled "Protecting the Arctic," which was included in a packet accompanying his letter to Michels.

Commissioner Charlie Lean moved that the Nome Port Commission take no stand on the issue, pointing out that the state controls an area out to three miles off Alaska's coast and the federal government controls the area from that point to 200 miles offshore. Commissioner Jeff Darling seconded the motion.

Harbormaster's report

Baker provided copies of a spread sheet and graphs recording volumes and revenues for cargo, gravel and fuel received by the Port of Nome from 1988 through FY 2010, as requested by Lean. Figures for FY 2010 ending June 30 show a total of $597,298 in causeway revenues and a total of $214,010 in jetty revenues.

Baker's written report to the commission notes the following port activities for the month of June. Inbound general cargo at the causeway totaled more than 6,167 tons with 5.6 tons outbound or through (village freight) and about 6,465 tons of gravel exported. Inbound fuel in June totaled 621,302 gallons with 65,553 gallons outbound and 221,323 gallons moved over-side. (Over-side means moving cargo or fuel between two barges that are tied to the dock.)

Cargo for the inner harbor came in at about 279 tons, and more than 895 tons went outbound or through (village freight) at the barge ramps. Fuel came in at 1.4 million gallons with no outbound during June. (The lighter barges were loaded with village fuel over-side at the causeway after the Nome discharge operations were complete.) June invoicing totaled just under $190,000 for all facility operations.

The number of gold dredges operating out of the harbor has increased significantly this season. "When added to the existing fishing fleet also based in the harbor, conflicts with space for the larger cargo and fuel vessels prove to be a challenge,' Baker wrote. "Efforts are made in coordinating and scheduling to minimize congestion when at all possi-

The causeway fuel lines and pressure hoses passed the annual hydrostatic pressure tests conducted by the fuel line maintenance contractor, Seakers, Inc. "Corrosion on the expansion valves at the bridge continues to be of great concern, so a temporary liner has been sealed around each valve as a protective measure during fuel transfers throughout the season," Baker wrote. "Additional precautionary measures are being taken during all transfers this season as a permanent solution is being sought with USACE and Kiewit Pacific." Baker provided commissioners with Seakers' written report of the annual pipeline air test, accompanied by about three dozen photos illustrating corrosion prob-

City Manager/Port Director Josie Bahnke said she and Baker have prepared a "white paper" for Col. Reinhard Koenig, USACE Alaska District commander, as part of an effort to seek installation of a more permanent replacement for the causeway fuel lines. Noting that a meeting with Koenig slated for July 14 was cancelled due to an emergency in his family, she expressed hope the meeting will be resched-

Bahnke said the City will consider preparing a funding proposal for high mast lighting at the causeway bundled with an electrical upgrade for power service on the causeway to submit to the Denali Commission.

New Port Commissioner Cam Kristensen was sworn in at the beginning of the meeting.

Phase IV east Nome water and sewer replacement and expansion will continue in 2014 along with construction of a septage (waste) disposal facility either at the monofill on Center Creek Road or at the landfill on Beam Road; finish backup water source and constructing a water transmission main to connect to the current Moonlight water transmission main. Nome has been using water from the Moonlight Springs area for the past 100 years. Water quality meets all state and federal standards, but there has been no backup source. Grand total for 2014: $8.3 million.

In 2015 construction season, crews will replace 1,770 feet of the aging four-inch water main in the central water distribution system area with eight-inch HDPE (insulated) arctic water main and reconfigure the water main distribution system stretching from satellite field to Icy View to create a water source circulation loop. The total for 2015 improvements: $4.08 million.

Additional projects underway this summer include a Beltz water treatment plant upgrade and expansion with backup power upgrades and Moonlight Springs transmission main upgrade.

Late chum salmon run breaks record at Kwiniuk River tower

By Laurie McNicholas

The cumulative chum count at the Kwiniuk River tower in the Elim subdistrict reached a record-breaking 67,596 chums on July 25, reports Scott Kent. assistant manager, Arctic region, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game. The tower's previous best count was 66.604 chums in 1970.

The department switched its focus from commercial chum salmon management to commercial coho (silver) salmon management in Norton Sound on July 26, but an unprecedented late surge in the chum run likely will result in chum catches exceeding silver catches this week, notes Jim Menard, ADF&G's area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue.

"The [Norton Sound] commercial chum salmon harvest is on track to be the best harvest since 1986," he said.... "This year as we are overrun with chum salmon, we will still be commercial fishing on them as often as the buyer can get the tenders ready.'

The subsistence set gillnet schedule in marine waters of the Nome subdistrict dropped to 72 hours a week (6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Saturday), after the silver salmon management schedule began July 26. For the previous two weeks Menard had doubled subsistence fishing time to 144 hours per week in marine waters of the subdistrict. He said the Nome River weir count topped 3,000 chums, the low end of the escapement goal, on July 25.

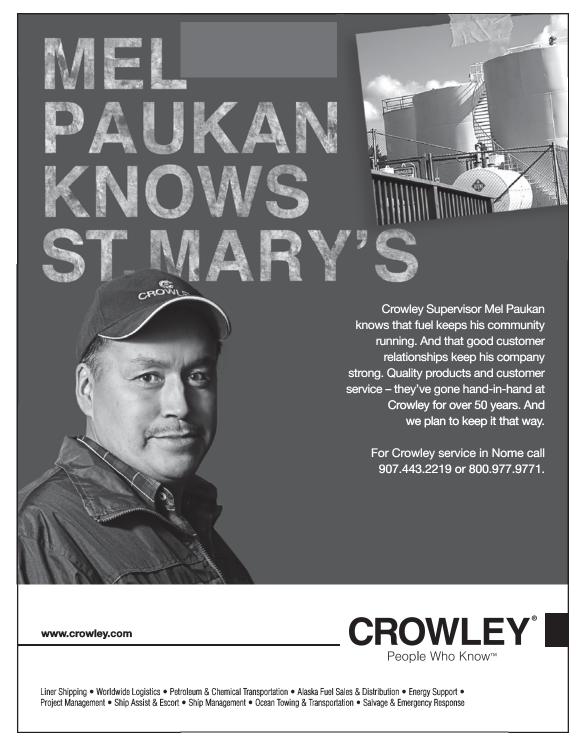

This year's pink salmon run wasn't as strong as the recordbreaking even years of most of the 2000s, and the Norton Sound runs of kings and sockeye continue to be weak, Menard reports. He said silvers are appearing in commercial salmon harvests throughout the sound.

Subsistence fishing net restrictions in marine waters of the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts will end July 31, Kent said. Currently subsistence fishing nets in the Unalakleet River are restricted to 4-1/2 inches or less stretched mesh.

Red king crab harvest

Commercial fishers harvested 108,000 pounds of Norton Sound red king crab as of July 25, Menard reports. About 262,000 pounds of crab remain in the open access fishery quota of 370,000 pounds. Twenty of the 26 permit holders registered for the open access fishery have made at least one delivery.

Plantar warts

Alaska Family Doctor

The plantar wart, related to the common wart, is a wart that forms on the bottom of the foot. The wart is caused by a strain of the Human Papilloma Virus (HPV) and is acquired through cracks in the skin after contact with a contaminated surface like a shower floor, exercise mat,

In most people, the wart itself is harmless though admittedly unsightly and sometimes painful. But in people with a loss of sensation in the feet as with advanced diabetes mellitus, peripheral neuropathy, or peripheral vascular disease, the wart can become the first ingredient in a dangerous mix of events that leads to an ulcer and perhaps a serious foot infection.

The reason plantar warts become troublesome, and sometimes dangerous, is the fact that the body starts treating the cure as if it were the problem.

Once the HPV virus gains access to a cell, it turns off the part of the DNA that regulates cell growth, which allows cells to grow and divide at a higher rate. This causes the characteristic small soft bump of thickened skin that develops over the infected area. The foot confuses this extra skin with a foreign body, like a small rock in the shoe, and lays down even more thickened skin in the form of a callus. The body treats this thickened callus as a now larger foreign body and lays down even more of a callus, and so the cycle continues.

Without proper treatment, the enlarging wart covered with callus can put enough pressure on the underlying skin to form an ulcer, or serious infection, especially in people with a loss of protective sensation in the foot.

Plantar warts usually last for several years. Many people eventually develop an immune response to the virus and the wart itself disappears. Up to 65 percent resolve within two years. In some people the wart and overlying callus can last for decades, if not a lifetime.

There is a long list of old and new remedies for the treatment of plantar warts. No single cure seems to work uniformly for everyone. Adhesiotherapy, literally applying duct tape or similar adhesive to the wart daily for several weeks works for some people. Lemon juice, tumeric powder, salicylic acid, apple-cider vinegar, and various prescribed topical chemotherapy agents work for others. Most of these methods require daily attention with the application of the treatment for four to twelve weeks.

Surgical excision, cryotherapy, laser therapy, electrodessication and curettage, or injection of the wart with one of several vaccines is an option for people with plantar warts that do not respond to conservative therapy.

There are over 100 different strains of the HPV virus, seven of which commonly cause plantar warts. This explains why there are many recommended therapies. No single cure works for all strains of virus.

The best approach for treatment is to try various remedies until one is found that works. If the wart is not causing pain or discomfort, a trial of "benign neglect" where no treatment is applied may be acceptable.

When treatment is desired, it is generally best to start with the least expensive, least painful, and least time-consuming methods.

Even if treatment fails, or the warts recur, it is important to keep the affected area from forming a large callus, especially in people who have a loss of protective sensation in the feet. Soaking the feet in warm water followed by removal of the callus with a pumice stone or buffer to keep the skin smooth helps prevent the formation of pressure ulcers from enlarging calluses over a plantar wart.

Treatment of plantar warts can be difficult. It is not uncommon for patients to become frustrated after failure of one or two remedies. See your medical provider for a discussion of further options if over-thecounter and home remedies fail to remove the wart. Your provider can also prescribe treatments or recommend surgical approaches if home remedies do not work.

By Tyler Rhodes CRIPPLE RIVER MINING CAMP—Taking a short break from shoveling load after load of sand from a small plot on the shore of the Bering Sea July 15, Randy and Deidre Cox admitted they didn't give friends and co-workers too many details about the two weeks they were spending in Alaska this summer.

"We told friends we were going to a primitive dude ranch," Randy said. "If we told them we're going gold prospecting..." He didn't finish his sentence, leaving to speculation the judgment others would pass if they knew he and Deidre were spending their two-week summer vacation laboring away in search of pay dirt.

But if the Coxes are crazy, they're far from alone in experiencing the malady. Stretched out along the shore for a mile to the east on this particular Thursday morning, two dozen other souls clad in rain gear shoveled loads into buckets and boxes, all looking for a bit of sparkle in the sands. Hailing from across the nation, they had all paid to come work in this remote corner of Alaska; and after a brief conversation with a handful of them, it appeared that they couldn't have been happier.

For years the Gold Prospectors Association of America has catered to modern-day fortune-seekers, attracting people from all walks of life to its camp along the Cripple River and the beach approximately 12 miles west of Nome. Guests are lodged in crude "hooches" that line both sides of a horseshoe-shaped street in what looks like an old Western outpost sitting on the tundra just above the beach. Among the weathered buildings are a chow hall, general store, saloon for Friday night gatherings and a church.

The camp is accessed by driving along the beach from Nome. The outfit owns several trucks, their bodies raised high off the wheels to allow for an easier crossing of the Penny River before arriving at the camp. The vehicle of choice for most at the camp, however, is the fourwheeler. A special parking area and access road are reserved for the diminutive vehicles.

Guests are provided with a shovel, gold pan and a bucket, and are assigned a roughly eight- by 20-foot patch of beach to work. Those who arrive as a team, like Randy and Deidre Cox, work the patch together, while solo guests are assigned a partner. The guests get to keep whatever gold they find on the beach, which mostly consists of fine flakes and the occasional coarser piece and maybe even a tiny nugget-or pickers, as they're called. No one goes home rich, let alone finding enough to cover the expense of their trip to

While it may be the lure of gold that draws the guests up, they do not come expecting to strike it big. The experience alone is enough to draw back Darold Schmoll, who was working a beach box alone about a half mile down the beach from the Coxes July 15. "I came to get away from Kansas City. I like the outdoors," said the truck mechanic from Olathe, Kan

After coming to the camp in 2007 and 2008, Schmoll took a one-year hiatus before signing up for his third hitch this summer. On a rare sunny and calm day along the coast, Schmoll was more than happy to be searching for gold, no matter how much effort it took. "This is harder than being at work," he said, beaming. "I'm kind of living on [the pain reliever] naproxin. The buckets weigh more than I do.'

TEAMWORK-Husband and wife team Randy and Deirdre Cox of Okemos, Mich., spend their Alaska vacation working a beach box on the shores of Norton Sound at the GPAA Cripple River mining camp. The duo said they planned to spend the first of their two weeks at the camp working the sands.

GHOST TOWN? - The streets of the GPAA Cripple River mining camp are nearly deserted on July 15 as most of the guests are either out working the beach or on an outing during a beautiful morning.

Lure of gold

Schmoll was manning the beach box solo that morning, saying his partner had caught the "camp crud."
"I'm a one-man band today," he said. The beach box, a contraption that has been used in different configurations for more than a century along Nome's golden beaches, looks almost like a small, open pinball machine. Angled downward, the box has a mat along its bottom that allows the heavy gold to collect while a steady stream of water washes away the lighter sand and dirt. The water is pumped from the sea, and sprays the workers as well as the box, thus the rain gear even on a

A bit of glimmer could be seen in Schmoll's mat, showing a bit of payoff for his morning's work. "I got a third of an ounce in two days on the beach last year," he said. Schmoll said he doesn't sell the gold he finds, but keeps it in a small display case.

The guests this particular week are predominately men, middle-aged or older. Schmoll said he's tried to convince his wife to join him at the camp, but has not succeeded yet, mostly due to the less-than-luxurious accommodations. "It's definitely primitive," he said. "My wife, I can't talk her into it. She spotted outhouses

But there are women and younger guests who do make the trip. Some are husband-and-wife pairs, like the Coxes, while some parents bring their young children along. A grandfather and grandson spent about 15 minutes eyeing their plot and beach box during the late morning hours before deciding to take the short ride back to the camp's mess hall for lunch, leaving the work for the after-

Not shy about working his way through the morning was Harold Miessler, a gentleman well into retirement age from Douglas, Wyo. Despite his gray hairs, Miessler kept a steady hand on his shovel, filling bucket after bucket with sand. Like Schmoll, Miessler was up for his third trip. Also like Schmoll, Miessler felt the strain of the work. "Last year I ate about twice what I normally eat and I lost six pounds,"

Most people encountered at the camp said they were staying for two weeks. In addition to the gold, they come for the camaraderie. "It's a good bunch of people and the crew of the camp, they go out of their way to help you," Miessler said.

Clarence Hill, one of those crew members, started out as a guest himself. From Cottonwood, Arizona, Hill said he first came to the Cripple camp in 1998 and stayed for six weeks. He was back a few years later to work as the beach master for a stretch of years, making sure guests were getting along OK as they worked the sands. "I enjoy helping people. I enjoy the company," he said as he sat atop his four-wheeler, soaking in the sun.

Hill said the crewmembers have over the years been able to take a week or two during their stints to mine for themselves, helping to feed their prospecting fix. He said prospecting runs in his family, noting his grandfather was a gold seeker. Hill got his start in 1952. Like the guests who return year after year, it's the people that keep him coming back for more. "There's a bunch of nice people on the crew," he said.

Hill, however, didn't have such kind words for Mother Nature's tendency to throw a few challenges at the miners. "It sure is miserable sometimes," he said, noting how storms can disrupt the work. Indeed, several guests said their prospecting had to be cut short some years due to the waves crashing upon the shore. A report on this year's camp blog reported many of its pumps being damaged by big waves.

But as long as conditions weren't dangerous, rain or shine, the Coxes said they were committed to working the beach as long as they could for their two-week stint. This is their first year at Cripple River. Like many others, they said they learned of the camp through the Outdoor Channel, which shares ownership ties with the camp. After watching the shows "Gold Prospecting" and "Gold Fever," they soon joined the Gold Prospectors Association of America. Less than a year later the Coxes found themselves leaving home in Okemos, Mich., and working the sands of Norton Sound.

Admittedly neophytes, Randy said the crew at the camp graciously showed them the ropes the first couple of days and that they were starting to get the hang of working the beach box. Committed to looking for gold on the beach, they said they were likely not going to avail themselves of the other offerings at the camp. In addition to working the beach, guests can fish the Cripple River, go on the search for beach glass, help work the camp's dredge operation farther up the river inland, take trips to Nome and beyond for tours, among other offerings. "We didn't want to try and do everything," Deidre said.

As happy as she appeared, Deidre said two weeks of living in the hooch and using an outhouse would be enough for her for one stint. Randy noted that he had been to Alaska previously for work in 1975-1976, and said that Deidre had always wanted to see the state. "Now she can't complain about me not taking her to Alaska," he joked.

With a smile on her face and a shovel in her hand, Deidre mulled her husband's comment over for a minute. "Next time maybe we'll take a cruise," she said.

Man hit by cab

By Denise Olin

Richley Abbott, 68, was hit by E-Z Cab at 2 p.m. on Aug. 21 at the AC store parking lot in Nome. Abbott had just exited the store, walking toward his parked vehicle, when the cab hit him from behind. The Nome Ambulance took him to Norton Sound Hospital, and he was medivaced to Anchorage with injuries to his face and foot. He was treated and returned to Nome

Abbott tells of the event, "I didn't see [the cab] coming. All I saw was the ground and a black vehicle on top of me." Glasses broken, face bleeding and foot hurting, Abbott didn't know what hit him. He was thankful that it wasn't an elderly woman or a child who'd been hit. He is a 300 plus pound, 6 foot 2 inch male who can take a blow, but he feels if it were anyone smaller they'd be dealing with greater injuries.

Abbott said he looked down at a pool of his blood and thought he saw his teeth in the mix. He examined it closely to find that they were just quartz pebbles. Since he is on blood thinning medication, Abbott tends to bleed a lot faster than others. He worries about any bleeding and would have liked to treat it with stinkweed, which is often used by local Natives for treatment of various ailments.

E-Z cab owner Steve Longley stated that he has ordered a couple of the back-up alarms that will let anyone nearby know that the vehicle is in reverse. He also asks his drivers to avoid backing up at all.

An Open Letter to the Community of Nome and Surrounding Villages Regarding Ownership and Use of Pilgrim Hot Springs

If you read the most recent Nome Nugget, you will have seen two articles related to Pilgrim Hot Springs. Both discussed the current need for visitors to the Springs to obtain a permit from Unaatuq, LLC, through its managing partner Bering Straits Native Corporation. Unaatuq, LLC is taking this opportunity to explain the purchase of the property from the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska, as well as the LLC's developing plans for the land.

It is without question that Pilgrim is a place of great importance to the residents of Nome and the greater Bering Straits region. Because of the land's history, particularly its place in the terrible events of 1918, and the orphanage that was operated there until 1942, BSNC began seeking an interest in property in mid-1990's. BSNC met with the CBNA and repeatedly appealed to the Diocese to either sell the property, or allow BSNC to oversee, manage, or improve the property. The BSNC Board of Directors' motives were simple: the property would have been available for selection and conveyance under ANCSA had it been available, and it is a significant site in the family histories of many of BSNC's shareholders. However, these efforts bore no fruit in part due to the existence of a 99-year lease on the property held by Pilgrim

When the CBNA was forced to enter into bankruptcy proceedings and liquidate its assets, BSNC realized the opportunity to finally obtain the property was now at hand. It was understood that the price for this property would be high, and BSNC appealed to the region's village corporations and other local organizations to jointly pursue the acquisition. BSNC along with Sitnasuak Native Corporation, Kawerak, Inc., Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, Mary's Igloo Native Corporation, Teller Native Corporation, and White Mountain Native Corporation, pooled their financial resources and purchased Pilgrim Hot Springs on March 5th through an auction in Federal Bankruptcy Court. On April 27, 2010 the Catholic Bishop of Northern Alaska issued a quit claim deed to the property and the transaction was finalized. Any and all prior claims or liens to the property were extinguished and deemed invalid, and the property's ownership passed to Unaatuq, LLC.

While production of electricity from the geothermal reserves has been discussed for many years and by many parties, the current cost for drilling, plant construction and transmission lines make this prospect highly unlikely into the foreseeable future. Additionally, it is unclear where the actual source of the heat in the valley is located. The University of Alaska has undertaken a study project at the Springs, but the program's goal is not the eventual production of electricity there. Unaatuq, LLC will continue to work with research agencies interested in analyzing and utilizing the geothermal resource for heat, electricity, and agricultural potential.

So the questions now are what does the future hold for Pilgrim Hot Springs, and more importantly how does the change in ownership effect people's use of the property? Ŭnaatuq, LLC is developing a land management plan for the property that will guide future efforts in the preservation of property and buildings, outline the parameters for what type of improvements and development may occur there, and what uses are consistent with the region's needs and the property's importance to local residents. One of the plan's core components is preservation of the ecosystem and historical nature of the property. The current plan requires permits for visiting the Property, which currently are issued at no charge. This is a sound management practice, as it protects the user, the LLC, and provides valuable information on the level of traffic and use at the property. Unaatuq, LLC thanks those who have already visited the BSNC office to receive permits. Unaatuq, LLC would also like to encourage local individuals and organizations that have an interest in improving and maintaining the Springs to contact us and discuss possible projects.

Through the years the community of Nome and the region's residents have used the property responsibly. Let's move ahead together for the benefit of the property and preserve the unique characteristics that make Pilgrim Hot Springs such a valuable resource for all. You may contact Unaatuq, LLC through the managing partner, Bering Straits Native Corporation, 110 Front Street, Suite 300, Nome, AK 99762, (907)443-5252 or land@beringstraits.com.

Research ship visits Nome

By Diana Haecker

Researchers with the University of Texas, the University of Maryland, University of Alaska Fairbanks and the Florida Institute of Technology last Friday docked at Nome harbor before setting out on a research trip to the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas. Their purpose is to conduct studies for the federal Mineral Management Service as MMS plans more outer continental shelf lease sales.

The researchers' project is called "Continuation of Arctic Nearshore Impact Monitoring In Development Area" - CANIMIDA for short. They are tasked to monitor impacts associated with production of oil from the Northstar Unit and other development activities that may take place in the near shore portion of the outer continental shelf in the Beaufort Sea. According to MMS's website, the study is to provide a basis in the evaluation of potential impacts. The data collected is supposed to help MMS in their decision making process as they open more OCS leases for sale. The scientists look at the potential environmental impact of Northstar and the potential Liberty project - a horizontal drilling project headed by BP. The Liberty offshore oilfield is located four miles off the northern coast of Alaska in Foggy Island Bay of the Beaufort Sea. BP estimates the oilfield holds about 100 million barrels of oil and about 78 billion cubic feet of natural gas. BP plans to develop the oilfield from its existing facilities in the Endicott field in Prudhoe Bay. BP proposes to use the world's first ultra extended reach drilling technology.

The scientists are researching whether development and production at Northstar and potential development at Liberty could result in increased or chronic loadings of dissolved contaminant metals and chronic pollution from industrial sources of petroleum or metals.

to change with time in order to be effective. If we don't change the way we think we would still use spears, bows and arrows and sails for hunting. We have to be futuristic.

I am speaking from over 30 years of teaching from kindergarten to college. I had parents come to observe their children in the classroom to see how students behave—only to see a student behave properly.

threatened with a 2 x 4 board by a parent because I had the student on restriction from gym activities for one night. Another parent threatened to bring a 22-250 rifle to educate me.

A teacher loves his/her students and wants them to learn; otherwise we would not be teachers. It takes a whole community to educate a child. One wrong comment from a parent or board member will generate problems among the rest of the students. It is the greatest feeling to hear exstudents say "thank you for making me behave.'

A student who has problems at home will react negatively. Alcoholism, more than anything else will affect a child. My recommendation for teachers is to document all negative reactions—and to praise the students who behave, and are model students.

All students have to have adult supervision otherwise if something happens the teacher is liable. Using technology is not surveying students but controlling them. The footage can be used to show the parents how hard it is to control the students. I know some teachers will allow their students to sleep or misbehave because they are afraid of the parents. I praise the Bering Strait School District and Northwest Arctic School District for using technology to better educate our children and grandchildren. We need a more modern education than we had 10 - 20 years ago. I hate to go back in time by using primitive methods. Education is always outdated.

Thanks, Jon, for helping the teachers to better educate our children. Please call me if you disagree or agree with me at 907-639-1092. Our children are our future teachers and parents.

Sincerely and with all due respect, George Olanna

White Alice waits for shoe to drop

By Sandra L. Medearis

The White Alice antenna towers stand solidly and tons-heavy atop Anvil Mountain while their fate teeters on the consensus of the military, the BLM and Sitnasuak Native Corp. on whether they will be cleaned up and saved from demolition.

Remnants of the White Alice Communications System that networked the state, the antennas stood to provide advance notice of Soviet attack during the Cold War and a mented contamination by polychlorinated biphenyls—PCBs, especially at the base of the northeast tower. Former employees said they buried contaminants at the site.

Showing the way

Local people, folks who have moved away, and people who have never lived in Nome but have been alerted to the Cold War icons' possible demise, say they want the towers

"What a magnificent site! All the time, remembering that painting the towers was the reason Jim, Sr. first visited Nome, loved it, and spent 45 more 'hustlin' years there."

- Robert West

means of communication for U.S. fighter airplanes' counterattack. As a spinoff, the White Alice system opened remote villages to communication with the outside and increased long distance phone service.

SNC wants to claim the site under Native land rights. But before that can happen, the federal Bureau of Land Management has to find the land and four 60-ft towers clean of contaminants—asbestos, PCBs and the like. Until the BLM accepts the towers as a pass-through agency, they belong to the U.S. Air Force.

No decision

Crystal Anderson Booth, SNC executive, said last week that a meeting of the land committee attended by Steve Hunt, USAF project manager, had not produced a decision, that even if the towers had Glassbestos-laden backs removed and replaced with clean covers, the site might not pass BLM muster. Glassbestos is as it sounds, a mixture of glass and asbestos.

Site cleanups at other stations have demolished the antennas and cost in the millions of dollars. A much larger site at Northeast Cape on St. Lawrence Island has consumed $10.5 million and the costly work continues. Anvil Mountain site is one of the few left standing.

Currently an orange web fence separates the towers from visitors while contractors remove PCBs from the soil. USAF studies have docuto keep standing tall on the 1,112-ft mountain, visible from afar both as souvenirs and as landmarks to guide local residents when they are traveling by land, water or air.

Some see historical value in the towers. Some just have fond memories—looking through their windows as a child and seeing the big antennas. To some, the antennas still have practical uses that demand support.

An e-mail address set up by supporters, Friends of White Alice has garnered just that—lots of messages of support from current residents and those who have moved away, but have fond memories of seeing White Alice towers from, say, the breakfast table.

Kim Carter of Nome, 13 years a HAM radio operator, said a substitute for White Alice as a spot for the Seward Peninsula Amateur Radio Club's repeater did not exist—close to town and providing lots of coverage with its height. SPARC uses the repeater that is housed in the towers for both local transmissions and some areas of coverage right around Nome.

"We have a high spot for the repeater as well as a covered, secure place to house all the batteries, duplexers, and all that it takes to make even one mountain top repeater in our system work," she wrote. "Without this crucial part of our system, we will have a loss of coverage in case of emergency until another spot is located, that I can tell you, won't be nearly as good...We can also access it easily by truck, snowmachine or four-wheeler."

The curved midcentury style towers weighed around 100 tons each before their copper and other components were stripped out. In their heyday from the late 1950s through the next decade the antennas bounced telephone and telegraph messages off the layer of atmosphere called the troposphere and down to the next station to relay from station to station to their destinations.

Making memories

"Thope they will be saved," wrote Morgan "Buzz" Sanders, formerly of Golovin. "I worked there in the Sixties and early Seventies with Tom Johnson, Stan Harhut, Ralph Smith, Bernard Blumenstein, Hap Ebberly, and Ralph Burgess. Two antennas TX and RX [transmit and receive] toward Northeast Cape and Granite Mountain. We worked 54 hours a week,"

Sanders continued. "Anvil Mountain was manned 24/7. I hope this landmark will stay."

Robert West said that when he and brother Joe came to his father, Jim West Sr.'s funeral last year, the first thing they did was go up to Anvil Mountain by the towers to view the terrain and sea with brother Jim West, Jr.

"What a magnificent site!" Robert said—"all the time, remembering that painting the towers was the reason Jim, Sr. first visited Nome, loved it, and spent 45 more 'hustlin' years there."

Robert West suggested at least one of the towers be made into a light-house as a historical monument, "providing a clear and strong beacon to future residents and travelers."

Don't think so

Most, but not everybody is enamored of White Alice. Some people's memories are another man's clutter, according to William Sidmore. Anvil Mountain can do without White Alice antenna towers as decoration, he said.

"When I view the landscape, the tundra and the single most important ingredient to our daily view is a certain magic, that just a 'natural' landscape offers. No object that is constructed by people has an accepted collaboration with a natural setting," he wrote. "The very best view on Anvil Mountain is its 'natural' form, a form that is hundreds of thousands of years ancient and a mountain that remains in the minds of residents throughout prehistory.

"Then we can look upon all the metal debris in the region as 'ART,' well then, the Anvil Towers are Art, and so, like all of the other metal debris in Nome, the towers are just another debris field. Nature is better."

ALASKA'S BIG BROTHER?—This large antenna on Anvil Mountain was part of the White Alice Communications watch-out system against feared surprise attacks from Soviet Union during the Cold War. The sixty-foot antenna, one of four, towers over a sign from the days when the Alaska Air Command restricted entry without a pass from a higher authority, according to the sign, now used for target practice.

West beach offshore off limits to Nome's rec beach miners

By Sandra L. Medearis

Saturday sunset found a flock of small gold mining suction dredges working offshore west of the Port of Nome causeway where miners say the pickings are better. Sunday, the floating mine rigs had disappeared and left several larger contract miners with only the company of gulls searching the waters for treasure.

A notice tacked up at the Polar Café and about town sent gold miners scurrying from offshore west beach to new positions offshore east beach last weekend. Before weather turned choppy, Sunday pedestrians along East Front Street Road could count 14 dredges dotting the water east of downtown.

The notice from state Dept. of Natural Resource's mining division said that recreational miners who thought expiration of Norm Stile's claim on July 31cleared the way to flock to west beach to mine free got it wrong. They had to leave, according to the notification from Kermit Krause of Diner's Mining Water and Lands Division. That left larger dredges, such as the backhoe operated by Steve Momence and several other contract miners on Stiles' claims still operating. Stiles' leases, under K & S Leasing Inc., extending roughly 1.5 miles offshore in a swath from the port causeway to a point midway between Penny and Cripple rivers expired Saturday, July 31, but are tied up in litigation and still valid.

Several miners with contracts to use Stiles' claim, and give him a cut of the gold, can continue to mine as long as activity is occurring, but mining areas may shift and suction dredgers may be able to move where the cost to mine is less. State DNR records show no affidavits of Labor filed by J & S Leasing since 2007.

The DNR hopes to reduce the area of Stiles' holdings within the next 30 days, taking the area down from the current 8,000 square acres to 2,000 square acres. Krause intended to confer with Stiles (unavailable for comment) concerning Stiles' preferred location of the 2,000 acres this

The DNR has plans to hold a lease sale soon for offshore areas extending from west of Nome River to Rodney Creek, including acres previously held by Stiles. The sale will not offer all the land at once, maybe half, the exact amount of acreage still to be determined, Krause said. "We'll keep some ground for the next several years."

The state will offer small areas near shore for recreational miners and larger leases in deep water for companies with larger equipment.

Recreational miners, with small 8-inch suction dredges, must stay close to shore in water no deeper than 20 feet.

In this shallow water, because wave action is continually changing the bottom, "the state doesn't have any habitat concerns," Krause said, because waves keep the bottom continually stirred up.

In deeper water where commercial operators will be mining larger tracts with larger equipment, they will be in benthic habitat that supports crab populations, he said.

"These operators would have to obtain individual permits and would be looked at differently, falling under concerns of the federal Army Corps of Engineers and Environmental Protection Agency and monitoring requirements of turbidity, discharge," Krause said. "There must be underwater photography at certain intervals and lots of samples."

The price of gold and a moratorium on mining in California have increased the numbers of miners coming to sift the gold-bearing ocean sediment of former beach lines beneath Norton Sound.

TRAPPED IN NET—Swaddled head to flippers, a ringed seal pup caught in a gillnet off Nome's west beach is alive and was freed by biologists

A lucky little ringed seal that became entangled in a king salmon net off Nome's west beach was discovered and released by Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game fisheries biologists Jim Menard and Gary Knuepfer on Sunday, Aug. 1.

The net was among five subsistence gillnets the biologists seized Aug. I because the nets were fishing illegally. Menard said some fishers thought gillnetting was open till 6 p.m. Sunday, but the schedule had changed to 6 p.m. Monday to 6 p.m. Saturday by regulation when the department shifted its management focus from chum salmon to silver salmon on July 26.

"We got [the seal pup] in the boat, but it was trying to bite the hand that was freeing it," Menard said. "The seal was set free, so it gets to fish again. Unlike Nome subsistence fishers, this seal can fish seven days a week with no catch limits." He showed his photos of the pup to ADF&G Marine Mammal Biologist Gay Sheffield, who identified it as a ringed seal only on few months old.

"I wonder how many lives the seal pup will have?" Menard mused. "He/she dodged the polar bears this spring and now slipped out of a net with an assist." Menard is ADF&G area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue.

Letters

To the Editor of the Nome Nugget,

My name is Jacob Woodward; I am a resident of St. Albans Vermont. I recently visited the Cleveland Museum of Natural History to see the most famous dog in the world, which of course is Balto. I fell in love with the story of Balto when I was around five years old with the release of the 1995 movie Balto starring Kevin Bacon, Bridget Fonda, and Bob Hoskins. Since that day I have been fascinated by the Serum Run and the impact it had on your town.

When I visited the museum I was surprised to find Balto in a remote corner of the museum almost placed there as an after-thought. A lot of the visitors passed him by without giving him a second look. Most didn't even stop to watch the pathetic fourminute video displayed on a small

TV next to him. The video displayed footage of Balto and his team arriving in Nome, then it showed them in New York City for the unveiling of the statue there, then their arrival in Cleveland, Ohio. The last portions of the video were dedicated to Togo and Leonard Seppala. If it hadn't been for this video you would not have known who Balto was or what made him so special. He would have been another stuffed animal in the museum that no one would have cared for.

I have learned that on occasion the museum has an entire day dedicated to the Serum Run and they display artifacts pertaining to the Serum Run and Balto. But any other time Balto is placed out of the way, and most people don't even bother to pay attention to him. Another thing that Americans want Wall Street regulation, we don't want banks to gamble with our money. We don't think CEOs are worth the bloated salaries they pay themselves. We don't feel sorry that BP is being made to pay to clean up their mess and compensate the folks who lost their livelihood. We hate pollution. We fear the high cost of health care and are glad to have health care reform. The Economic Stimulus Act helped many, especially Nomeites who are working on the construction of the new hospital. So why are voters upset?

They Just Don't Get it

Progress is being made. The Obama administration in getting things done in spite of the obstructionists whose main objective is to make Obama fail. These politicians do not care for the well being of the folks they govern. Why did the Republicans block the extension of unemployment benefits? Why are they vowing to repeal health care reform? What happened to the concept of ruling for the good of the people? We still have 10 percent unemployment and tight credit. Sure, folks are concerned that economic recovery has not yet reached their level. The Republicans are banking on that unrest to get themselves back in office so they can take over Congress and repeal every positive piece of legislation accomplished by the Democrats. President Obama has it right when he says "The Republicans drove the car into the ditch and now they want the keys back. No!"

Wouldn't it be great if we had politicians who could work together for the good of the people instead of tearing down the foundation of government like a plague of termites and carpenter ants? Our so-called disinterested voters need to wake up and get politically active.

The home-owned newspaper angered me was the fact that Balto is supposed to be placed in a low light environment because any intense light will fade his pelt. Unfortunately, his pelt has faded from black to a mahogany brown color. When I visited he was on display in a rather sunny part of the museum near a large window that overlooked a duck pond on the outside animal exhibit. Also there were intense electric lights beaming down onto him.

It is sad to see a hero such as Balto treated with such disrespect. Balto deserves a proper exhibit year round and not something that is brought out now and again. Balto is now nothing more than something to take up wall space. Given that so many people just walk past him without a second look shows that the Cleveland Museum staff doesn't really do him any justice.

I am currently working on creating a petition to send to the Cleveland museum to have Balto displayed properly. I hope to gain support from the many legions of fans that Balto has. Sites like http://www.animationsource.org/balto/en/ are places in which fans of not only the Balto movie series gather but also learn the true story of Balto and the other dogs who helped save lives so long ago. Sincerely,

Jacob Woodward St. Albans, Vermont

Three die in cargo plane crash at Denali National

A large Fairchild C-123 cargo plane registered to All West Freight, Inc. of Delta Junction, crashed in the Denali National Park on August 1. The Park Service released the names of the crash's victims as Bill Michel, 61, of Delta Junction; John Eshleman, 52, of Wasilla, and Paul Quartly, 66, of Wasilla. Michel was the owner of All West Freight, Inc. and the plane's pilot. The plane went down within a mile of the park headquarters and started a wildland fire. The first personnel arrived on scene within minutes, but the wreckage was already engulfed in flames. In addition to National Park Service medics and other emergency responders, the Alaska Fire Service dropped eight smokejumpers into the scene. The National Transportation Safety Board and the Federal Aviation Administration are investigating the cause of the crash.

Elmendorf cargo plane crashes, four dead

During a trainings flight for the "Arctic Thunder" air show at Elmendorf Air Force Base, a C-17 Boeing cargo plane crashed moments after take-off on Wednesday, July 28. All four crew members were killed in the crash. They were Major Aaron W. Malone, Major Michael H. Freyholtz, Captain Jeffrey A. Hill and Master Sgt. Thomas E. Cicardo. Cicardo was posthumously promoted to Senior Master Sgt. The crash is under investigation and despite the tragic event, the air show Arctic Thunder was held last weekend at Elmendorf.

Polar bear seen in Emmonak

The Tundra Drums reports that residents in Emmonak on the lower Yukon River witnessed a polar bear swimming in the river on July 20. A crowd gathered, watching in their boats from a safe distance as the bear remained in one area, sometimes standing but not seeming aggressive. US Fish and Wildlife officials suspect that the bear had missed the ice as it was retreating northward. Based on recent reports from the area, agency officials speculate that as many as five polar bears may have originally been traveling together on the ice.

Parnell declares state disaster on Taylor Highway

Governor Sean Parnell declared a state disaster for the flooding last month that damaged sections of the Taylor Highway linking Eagle, Chicken and Boundary in the eastern Interior. The state will fund or will seek federal funding for emergency response costs, infrastructure restoration and long-term measures to prevent a recurrence of the landslide and road erosion damages resulting from the flooding. Beginning on July 10, heavy rainfall on the Upper Tanana and Yukon River Basin caused landslides, erosion and drainage damage, and washed out sections of the road. The Department of Transportation requested a state disaster declaration in order to get Federal Highway Administration Emergency Relief funding for permanent repairs to the damaged roads. The DOT estimates the damages done to the Taylor Highway at more than $6 million.

Obama cancels offshore oil lease sales in the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico

The Obama administration announced last week that it cancelled two offshore oil and gas lease sales in the Atlantic off the coast of Virginia and in the Gulf of Mexico. The Atlantic lease sale was part of a controversial area that Interior Secretary Ken Salazar approved for expanded offshore oil development after the Bush administration lifted the moratorium on drilling in the Atlantic. The Gulf of Mexico lease sale was scheduled to take place in mid-August. The notices say that canceling these lease sales would allow time "to develop and implement measures to improve the safety of oil and gas development in Federal waters, provide greater environmental protection, and substantially reduce the risk of catastrophic events.'

Open season for gas pipeline construction draws bids

The TransCanada Pipeline Company announced last week that there were multiple bids submitted by potential users of a gas pipeline from the North Slope to North American Markets. TransCanada's Tony Palmer vaguely told APRN last week that the bids came from the natural gas industry and they totaled a significant volume. Governor Parnell said that it is a positive sign that major players have placed bids and that the market has determined that Alaska's natural gas would be worth pursuing. U.S. Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, called the closure of the open season a milestone and said she was pleased to hear that companies have for the first time issued bids to finally send Alaska's natural gas to market. She also called on the Obama administration to unlock Alaska's full natural gas potential by removing the road blocks placed on developing resources in the Beaufort and Chukchi seas, NPR-A, and ANWR. The legislature has sanctioned TransCanada's project. A second proposal, the Denali Pipeline project's open season will close in October.

Yukon Quest announces purse

Before mushers sign up for the 2011 Yukon Quest International Sled Dog Race on August 7 in Fairbanks or Whitehorse, the Quest's board of directors announced a guaranteed purse of $150,000. Al Doherty, the Yukon Quest board president said that the race needs continued and new support to put on the 2011 as operating costs are escalating. He said that sponsor solicitation continues and that the organization continues their work to meet fundraising targets for 2011. Mushers can sign up in person on August 7 at the Log Cabin in Fairbanks or at the White Pass Depot in Whitehorse. An incentive draw will be held on August 13

ROUNDUP-The NSEDC Fisheries Research and Development crew walks a beach seine down river.

COLLECTING EGGS (right)-Michael Miller and Rhonda Sparks collect chum eggs in a Ziplock for safe keeping.

That time of year: Egg taking in the Nome subdistrict

By Reba Lean

The river boils inside a pursed up beach seine as dozens of ripe chum and pink salmon struggle to escape. At this time of year, their spawning colors and features are full-fledged, but beneath the churned-up water, it is hard to see what was caught.

"Grab the net pen," someone yells. While four people are left holding up the floats of the seine, one person runs up the sandbar and hauls a net cube into the water. It's time to sort the catch.

"Females will go in this one, and males in here. Throw the uglies out."

Tossing spawned-out salmon back into the river, the NSEDC Fisheries Research and Development crew prepares another catch for its chum egg takes.

Late July is prime time for chum salmon spawning. Each year NSEDC takes a certain number of spawners' eggs and milt to hatch themselves in order to boost the productivity of salmon in the area. This year, the crew is working with Snake River and Solomon River chum populations, and Snake River silver populations. Silver salmon egg takes begin in late August.

A crew of five or more will walk a beach seine down a stretch of river, and gather as many healthy-looking salmon as they can. They pick the females whose bellies are swollen full of eggs and look ready to spill at any moment. Once they are sacrificed, one person slits open the belly, while another catches the bright orange bounty in a sterilized bowl. The eggs are put into Ziploc bags and stored in a cooler until they can be taken back to the lab.

The males that have already been sorted in a pen wait impatiently to be released. Before they can go, the crew must collect their milt. A hand slid down the belly of the male squeezes the milt out. One person with an open bag catches, making sure to avoid blood, excrement and water.

When the crew has collected its necessities, they only have a matter of a few hours before their spoils spoil. The milt can become coagulated and infertile if not used quickly, and the eggs become hardened, refusing to fertilize. They are kept separate until they get to the lab because, once fertilized, the eggs become extra sensitive and would not survive a long transport.

The eggs and milt are mixed together and put into incubators where a cold mist that mimics river temperatures flows over them continually. Two and a half to three months in, the temperatures of the incubators to hatch bag catches, making sure to avoid blood, excrement and water.

July was normal for Nome

July came and went in a pleasant stretch of warmth. There were above normal temperatures for the first 11 days and the last two days of the month and below normal for the rest of the month. Nome had three days in a row of 70-plus temperatures. During this heat wave Nome tied the temperature records of 79°F from 1972. The three days with temperatures in the 70s was the longest span since Aug 16-18, 2007. The 79° posted on the 10th was the warmest temperature for the month and the year to date. The coolest day was the 15th with 34°F.

July had a normal dose of rainfall with 2.14 inches — just 0.01 inch under normal. There was rain 19 days, with the wettest day July 27 with 0.39 inch. The seven-day span from the 17th through the 23rd saw over half of the month's precipitation. There was a thunderstorm on the 9th, temporarily breaking the heat wave and punctuating the air with a few claps of thunder.

The average wind speed for the month was 6.5 mph, with the windiest day on the 18th with 18 mph. The highest wind gust was 35 mph on the 11th.

July went out with a pleasant 69°F, and August entered the scene with a warm 69°F and a cooling fog in the evening.

August is typically the wettest month of the year in Nome with 20 percent of our annual rainfall collecting this month.

Alaska commissioners promote Alaska's resources in Asia

Department of Natural Resources Commissioner Tom Irwin, Department of Environmental Conservation Commissioner Larry Hartig, Director of International Trade Cindy Sims and Director of the Office of Project Management and Permitting Ed Fogels were hosting an Alaska minerals seminar in Tokyo last week. The seminar was held in cooperation with the Japan Oil, Gas & Minerals National Corporation. The Japanese corporation invited the state to update the minerals business community in Tokyo about the state's resources.

The seminar will address land ownership and mine permitting, and provide a review of current successful operating mines and a look ahead to operations likely to come on line in the near future. Japan's Sumitomo Metal Mining Corp. has invested in the Pogo Gold Mine. The commissioners also attended the Japan International Seafood and Technology Expo, one of the world's largest seafood shows, and met with Japanese seafood buyers. Japan is Alaska's single largest international seafood market. Alaska's seafood exports to Japan in 2009 totaled $538 million and accounted for one third of the state's seafood exports.

Begich adds provisions to OCS development bill

The Senate Commerce Committee signed off on Mark Begich's proposed amendments to the so-called "Securing Health for Oceans Resources and Environment Act." The SHORE Act was prompted in part by the BP Deepwater Horizon tragedy in the Gulf of Mexico. Begich proposed to expand the Coast Guard capacity in the Arctic, to further research spill prevention and response techniques and to include an Arctic Regional Citizens Advisory Council modeled after similar citizen's groups in Prince William Sound and Cook Inlet after the 1989 Exxon Valdez oil spill to provide a forum for greater local participation in oil development decisions, oversight of spill planning and preparedness and monitoring of environmental conditions.

The Arctic RCAC would be composed of seven voting members that encompass local government, economic development and subsistence interests: the mayors of the North Slope Borough and Northwest Arctic Borough, the presidents of the Arctic Slope and NANA Regional Corporations, and the chairs of the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission, the Nanuuq Commission and the Beluga Whale Commission. Funded by the oil industry, the Council also would include a number of ex officio members, including representatives of state and federal regulatory agencies.

This particular provision rubbed Governor Parnell the wrong way and he announced his opposition. Parnell said he is concerned about the potential for delays in offshore oil and natural gas development and that the advisory council would create another layer of review and oversight of the development of OCS. Governor Parnell said the council could create unnecessary expense for the government and for the oil and gas industry.

Egg taking

are decreased, creating marks on the tiny otoliths (ear bones) of the growing embryonic fish, so when the fish are found again as adults, the crew will know whether or not they were raised in a lab by simply looking at the otolith under a microscope.

In Nome, the chum eggs are planted in mid-October in their home rivers using a pack frame-mounted pump. Water is driven through a crook-shaped pipe and blows holes about nine-inches deep, where eggs are gently poured. The eggs are left to incubate in the ground and are hatched in the wild about a week later.

NSEDC tested their brand new technology with chum eggs from the Nome River in 2005. They planted the eggs in Hastings Creek near Cape Nome to test the effectiveness of incubating and planting eggs. For each fish taken, one returned to the area, proving that incubation can work successfully for a stream that originally has no chum population. Since then, silver salmon returns in the Snake River area have yielded three returns from the initial parent.

Rain or shine, the fish technicians have only about a week to gather the amount they need. On a rainy day, a small group might be spotted on the river hunched under a tarp, trying to keep the rain from sterilizing the eggs. On a sunny day, the crew sweats underneath their Neoprene waders, as they hold on tight to the feisty fish.

On the river, the sweet familiar stench of rotting fish enters the nose. The crew unloads the four-wheeler trailer including the beach seine, net pens and coolers full of ice and sampling gear. They don their cotton gloves and begin their routine.

A few of the crew sneak upriver a hundred yards, splashing as far as they can reach, to spook salmon down into the start of the seine. A duo charges across the river once the fish are in place, and begin pulling downriver. Another duo takes the other end and the rest watch the net so it doesn't get caught on rocks or pick up too much sand. Nearing the end of the seine, a couple people run downriver to spook the fish up into the net, and the chaos of salmon trying to escape begins.

'She's a beauty," somebody remarks, holding up a ripe female with a bulging belly. She is set in the pen with the other promising lady fish.

"This one looks partial," somebody else says, looking at the slightly deflated tummy of another female. She is thrown back into the river, for fear that her belly is more full of water and bacteria than eggs.

And so goes the sorting. The crew is picky about females, but as many males as can fit are tossed into their own net pen. While the old-looking females are of no use to the crew, the slightly grayed (or molded, in this case) males sometimes have more milt than the freshly colored youngsters. Nevertheless, when a fish that is more skeleton than flesh is found, it is tossed back into the river to carry out its days in peace.

When all the eggs and milt are collected, the crew loads up the fourwheeler trailer again and leaves a slightly emptier river behind. In the back of their minds they know, however, that come the return of the fruits of their labor, it will be fuller again.

UNUSUAL SIGHT — Joe Garnie's dog team picks its way through the tall tundra grass back to Teller, returning from an early season training run.

Teller highlighted in German documentary

By Diana Haecker

Not a week goes by without a documentary about Alaska flickering across German TV screens. Germans are crazy about Alaska and film crews continue to flock to the far north. Last month, a ZDF public television crew descended on Nome and Teller to document the lifestyle of northwest Alaskans. The small crew of three were treated to the whole experience, including rain coming sideways, the annual reindeer roundup near Teller, the glory of subsistence fishing in Grantley Harbor and a rare summer training run with Joe Garnie and 14 of his champion sled dogs.

"The call of the wild" is the German film title and the crew focuses on documenting German expatriates living in Alaska and Canada, and their surroundings.

In Teller, the crew filmed Joe Garnie as he fished to put salmon away for his family. As temperatures were cool enough for an early season training run, Garnie, the only musher left in Teller, hooked up 14 of his sled dogs to a 250-pound wooden sled designed to glide over the tundra trail even without snow.

The Kakaruk reindeer herd managed by Julia Lee was also in the process of being rounded up. State senator Donny Olson, a reindeer herder, pushed the nearly 2,000 animals with his R-22 helicopter into the corral for processing. According to the walkers, most of the reindeer however escaped when the corral fence broke. Olson also owns a reindeer herd, but they are located at Delta.

Two travelers from Little Diomede arrived in Teller after a sixhour, rough boat ride in an open skiff. For the lack of helicopter transportation or other means to get to the mainland, Ronald Ozenna and Kyle Okpealuk braved rough waters between Diomede and Wales and the rest of the ride down the coast to Teller. They visited Teller relatives and brought subsistence goodies such as walrus hands, murre eggs and walrus meat. In Nome, the team filmed at the Nome Nugget and even highlighted the king-sized king crabs in the Norton Sound Seafood tank.

Film crews come a dime a dozen these days, and as the Germans left

Nome, another crew moved in to scout for locations and talent for an upcoming Hollywood feature film.

Summerfest 2010 Hits the Stage

By Jeremy Master

For the third consecutive year, Anvil City Square played host to Summerfest – a celebration of the season full of music, food, fun, and games. The event is formed around a talent completion for youth ages 14-28, and complemented by other youth oriented festivities.

Headlining this year's festivities were "Monday in Cancun," rocking the park with original indie rock tunes and unique versions of cover songs by original artists ranging from Miley Cyrus and Lady Gaga to the White Stripes and the Clash. Their set list was well conceived, starting strong with "Should I Stay or Should I Go?" then bringing the crowd along for a ride with well-placed ballads and fun covers, the occasional horn section, and by alternating vocal styles and leads between Kellen Baker and Brendan Wehde. Ripping baselines was Miranda Murphy, in tune and time with the talented Caleb Weaver on drums. On guitars were Wehde and Baker. All in all, it was a very dynamic performance, and well received by the sun drenched crowd on hand.

The talent competition boasted a total of $650 in cash and prizes for the top three contestants. While turnout for the contest was low, talent level was high. Bringing in first prize for her two heartfelt original

How to make water safe to drink

Bob Lawrence, MD

I was recently sitting around a camp stove with a group of Boy Scouts waiting for a pot of river water to boil when someone brought up the question: "How long do you have to boil the water before it's safe

As you might expect we had different answers to that question.

Some said, "one minute."

Others said, "three to five min-

Another said, "as long as you get to a rolling boil, you are safe.'

It turns out the correct answer depends on the elevation at which the water is being boiled, but in general bringing the water to a rolling boil is all that is needed.

The most common threat to gastrointestinal health from rivers. streams, and lakes in the Norton Sound region is a small parasite called Giardia lamblia. Once ingested, Giardia can cause stomach cramps, painful gas, and diarrhea usually starting 7-14 days after exposure. Giardia can be transmitted by animals like beavers, and tends to be concentrated in water downstream from beaver dams, thus giardiasis, the disease caused by Giardia, is often called "beaver

Another pathogen called cryptosporidium is a parasite occasionally found in Alaskan streams. It causes many of the same symptoms as giardia including diarrhea, loss of appetite, and low grade-fever.

Water sources may also be contaminated with common bacteria such as E. coli and Salmonella, or viruses like Hepatitis A, Rotovirus, or the Norwalk virus.

In general, bacteria and viruses are a greater threat in water around cabins, communities, and more popu-Giardia and areas. Cryptosporidium can be found in any water shared by other humans or animals.

Here are a few recommended methods for making sure your drinking water is safe in the outdoors.

Boiling. According to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), boiling water is the most effective way to make water safe for drinking without changing the taste of the water. Water brought up to 160° F for 30 minutes will kill or inactivate all parasites, bacteria, and viruses. At 185° F the process only take a few minutes. According to the Wilderness Medicine Society, by the time water is brought to a rolling boil at 212°F, all pathogens have been inactivated and the water is safe to use. Water boils at a lower temperature at higher altitudes. Therefore, to be safe, experts recommend adding one minute of boiling time for each 1,000 feet of elevation. For example, at 5.000 feet elevation, the water should be boiled for five minutes.

Chemical treatment. There are two preferred lightweight means of chemically treating water in the outdoors. Iodine tablets will kill most parasites, bacteria, and viruses, but do not kill cryptosporidium. The unappetizing taste of iodine can be neutralized by adding crushed vitamin C (ascorbic acid) or a powdered drink mix to treated water.

The second popular chemical treatment is called chlorine dioxide, the same chemical used in many municipal treatment facilities. For outdoor enthusiasts, the chlorine dioxide treatment comes in two small bottles, one containing the chlorine dioxide and the second containing a phosphoric acid activator. A few drops mixed together and added to a filled water bottle will inactivate all major parasites, bacteria, and viruses in a way that leaves the taste of the water virtually unchanged.

Filters. Filters are compact, reusable, and remove most pathogens without changing the taste of the water. Some filters cannot effectively remove the smallest pathogens, viruses, but all certified filters remove Giardia, Cryptosporidium, and bacteria.

UV radiation. In the relatively new and cool, though comparatively expensive category, ultraviolet light is becoming a popular way for outdoor enthusiasts to enjoy safe drinking water. The technology uses a small battery operated light source to inactivate the DNA of pathogens with UV radiation in as little as 60-90 seconds.

Regardless of the method chosen, making water safe for drinking is an important part of enjoying the outdoors and preventing illness.

See your provider if a gastrointestinal illness develops after a camping, hunting, or fishing trip. Parasites, bacteria, and viruses can infect even the most careful outdoor enthusiasts. Simple tests are available to determine the exact cause of an illness and guide proper choices in treatment.

Norton Sound commercial chum salmon harvest tops 100,000 fish

Last week the Norton Sound commercial chum salmon harvest topped 100,000 chums for the first time since 1988, reports Jim Menard, area manager for Norton Sound and Kotzebue, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game. A record 70,782 chums passed the Kwiniuk River tower in the Elim subdistrict through Aug. 1. The tower began operations in 1965 and is the department's longest running escapement project. Following is Menard's fisheries report for last Subdistricts 2-6 were open for commercial fishing for a 48-hour period ending at 6 p.m. July 31. However, capacity concerns and the breakdown of the tender Golovin Bay prevented the buyer, Norton Sound Seafood Products in Unalakleet, from buying salmon in subdistricts 3 (Elim) and 4 (Golovin). The Golovin Bay is expected to be operational for this week's commercial fishing schedule in subdistricts 2-6, from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday.

Last week chum salmon catches exceeded silvers catches in subdistricts 5 (Shaktoolik) and 6 (Unalakleet), but in subdistrict 2 (Golovin) silver catches surpassed the chum catches.

The Norton Sound king and sockeye salmon runs were weak this season, as was expected. The ADF&G forecast an above average pink salmon run, but the return was average for an even-numbered year. The commercial chum harvest came in well above the average 60,000 to 80,000 chum catch the department had predicted.

The department has forecast an above average silver salmon run, with a commercial harvest of 80,000 to 100,000 silvers. However, both silvers and pinks spend one year in the ocean, and it is possibe that the silver run will follow the pattern of the pink run this year, returning to Norton Sound in average numbers.

The cumulative Norton Sound commercial catch through July 31 was 92 kings, 31,826 pinks, 102,528 chums, 63 sockeyes and 8,992 sil-

Ninety kings passed the tower on Aug. 1, the second highest one-day count of the season. The total count ranks 12th out of 15 years. Kings were at about one-half of the recent 5-year and 10-year averages for this date.

A total of 11,870 chums, 142,092 pinks and 1,452 silvers passed the tower through Aug. 1. Chum passage is a record for this date and is double the 5-year and 10-year averages. The average third quarter point is Aug. 1. Pink passage ranked 6th out of 8 even-numbered year counts. songs, one written the night before, was Tammy Treend. While playing on a borrowed guitar, she delivered personal yet clever lyrics and belted out strong notes, commanding attention from anyone within city limits. Christian Vazquez secured second place for his dance routine, showcasing his timing, balance, and athleticism. Nicole Pomrenke took third, filling the air with her beautiful singing voice.

A highlight of the day was Chad Callahan stealing the crowd with his rendition of Bon Jovi's "You Give Love a Bad Name," possessing the same flair as the veteran arena rocker. Other highlights include the fantastic food sold by the Nome Senior High School Spanish Club, the popularity of the inflatable bounce house, volleyball, face painting, popcorn, door prizes, auctions, a drawing wall, and last but certainly not least - the magnificent weather!

The events could not have happened without major support from the Nome Community Center, and its Executive Director Lance Johnson. Summerfest was, and will always be a smoke-free event. Summerfest also exists solely due to the efforts of the following organizations and volunteers: Bush 907.com, Nome Eskimo Community, CHARR, Polar Café, City of Nome Department of Parks and Recreation, Kawerak, Inc., TESORO, National Park Service, Bonanza Express, GCI, Youth Education Services, Community Schools, Nome Public Schools, the Spanish Club, Brad Dittmar, Lance Cannon, Jeremy Master, Bruce Klein, Janet Klein, Al Burgo, Seiji Heck, Tara Schmidt, Nichole Andler, Craig Brummert, Steve Gast, Steve Smith, and Kent Runion. Summer fest is an activity for the citizens and visitors of our home, the great city of Nome. Folks who would like to get involved, please contact Bruce Klein at bfklein@hotmail.com. Thanks, Nome!

Crash kills Sen. Ted Stevens at 86

Nome Nugget wire services Former U.S. Sen. Ted Stevens, known to many Alaskans as "Uncle Ted" died in an airplane crash 17 miles north of the southwest Alaska Bristol Bay village of Dillingham on Aug. 9. Stevens, 86, longest serving Republican senator served 40 years before his defeat in 2008 by current Democrat U.S. Sen. Mark Begich.

A DeHavilland DHC-3T Otter aircraft with nine passengers en route to Agulowak Lodge near Lake Aleknagik, owned by General Communications Inc. went down in bad weather around 7 p.m. to 8 p.m. Monday, killing five and injuring at least three.

Mitch Rose, former Stevens aide and family spokesman confirmed Stevens' death midmorning Tuesday. Other names had not been released at press time.

Alaska telecommunications server GCI owned the small plane that also carried ex- NASA administrator under the Bush administration, Sean O'Keefe, 54. Stevens' friend and fishing buddy, O'Keefe was also current CEO of defense contractor EADS North America. His condition was not confirmed at press time midmorning Tuesday.

A low ceiling and poor visibility delayed multiple-agency rescue efforts until Tuesday morning when the U.S. Coast Guard and Alaska Army National Guard reached the crash site. However, a medical team, identified at press time only as Good Samaritans, did reach the scene and took care of survivors during the night, according to the Air Force 11th Coordination Rescue Center. According to an AANG statement Tuesday morning, two Alaska Air National Guard 212th Rescue Squadron para-rescuemen were providing medical assistance to crash victims. Council addresses complaints about conflicting uses of recreation areas

By Laurie McNicholas

Daniel Scholten wants the City of Nome to remove gold dredges, trucks, trailers and debris from the recreation area along the Snake River at 307 West Prospect Place. As a resident of the area, Scholten wrote a letter on behalf of children, families and elders who use the site to Mayor Denise Michels and the Nome Common Council on July 31, and they discussed it at a council meeting on Monday.

Scholten said families at Belmont Point, Prospect Place and from elsewhere in Nome used the area for swimming, fishing and boating for decades until about four years ago when miners who dredge for gold in summer months began to occupy it. "....There are up to 40 children at a time that play directly in this area and they are now not only deprived of the best fishing and swimming spot for them that they can walk to but their safety is in jeopardy,' Scholten wrote.

'Children for the most part are not supervised in this area and they will play on the equipment here because it is in their area," Sholten continued. "They can no longer play in the dry sand area, swim or fish like they used to. They have their bikes and toys run over, one young child almost drowned three weeks ago falling between two dredges!!'

Scholten complained that noisy work on the Michels said the council would discuss the topic in executive session following the regular meeting, and she invited Bullard to attend.

City Controller Cussy Kauer had suggested that council members consider whether to continue renting the Child Care Building or sell it for the assessed value during a council meeting on the city's FY 2011 budget on May 24. The building's tenants pay $90,000 per year in rent, but the city gains only $20,000 after operating costs are deducted, she noted. Kauer said the tenants are talking about remodeling the building and have cited water temperature issues. If the tenants were to buy the building, they would save money in the long run, and proceeds from the sale might benefit the city more than $20,000 in annual rental profits, she added.

On Monday the council approved an ordinance to lease an additional 152 square feet of office space at the Child Care Building to Kawerak for the Head Start Program at a rate of $2 per square foot per month. The lease addendum will take effect Sept. 1 and extend through Dec. 31, 2010 when Kawerak's lease expires.

The council unanimously rejected a resolution to authorize a suit by the city against Larry Carter and/or Larry's Auto Repair for past due port storage fees and recovery of property. The council reached the decision following discussion with Carter and his wife, Kay.

Larry's Auto Repair is located across a street from the Port of Nome's small boat harbor. The resolution states that Larry's Auto had three one-year lease agreements with the City of Nome that allowed the firm to occupy about 4,225 square feet within parcel 2, tract B of the Port of Nome's Small Boat Harbor from Sept. 1, 2002 through Aug. 31,

The shop was destroyed by fire on April 1, 2005 and the business was moved to another location. The city terminated the lease Aug. 31, 2005, the rent was paid in full and the property vacated, according to the resolution. Later the shop was rebuilt and Larry's Auto returned to the site in mid-2007. The resolution states that Larry's Auto began using Port of Nome property without express agreement or permission from the city, and that the Port of Nome began to send invoices to Larry's Auto based on weekly storage rates under the Port of Nome tariff that the firm did not pay.

Larry Carter's wife, Kay, told the council that Larry's Auto has no verbal or written lease with the city on land at the Small Boat Harbor, and she said it is the city's responsibility to place no trespassing signs and parking barriers on the property. Larry Carter said he does not park his customers' cars on Small Boat Harbor land and that he tells them not to park there. Kay Carter said the city declined a request from Larry's Auto to lease land at the small boat harbor for car storage because cars leak oil. Harbormaster Joy Baker said mass mailings are sent to port customers when the tariffs change, and Larry's Auto is on the mailing list. In answer to a question from Councilwoman Mary Knodel, Kay Carter said she had never received a copy of the tariff. The Carters said none of their customers' cars are parked on Small Boat Harbor land.

The council adopted a resolution awarding a contract to Alaska Aggregate Products to provide 2,500 tons of crushed aggregate for road surfacing materials at a rate of $24.34 a ton (total $$60,850). The materials are to be delivered to stockpiles designated by City of Nome, which will have an option to purchase an additional 2,500 tons at the same price in 2011.

Prior to the vote, Andersen asked Bahnke for details about bids for the project. She said the city had re-

Dear Nugget readers, and friends,

Many of you have continued these past two months to ask questions regarding an incident at my cabin at Glacier Creek June 4-5, 2010. I am happy to tell you the issue is now resolved to my satisfaction. Many of you wanted to "teach 'em a lessonhang 'em high." I could not push this through the judicial system, as I could not live with myself knowing I would have been a part of marking four young men with two felonies each, for the rest of their lives.

This has been a humbling experience for me, and a humiliating experience for the parents of the "Glacier Creek 4." Humiliated because there is nothing in their upbringing and raising of their children that would suggest development of or condoning the behavior demonstrated, and humbling for me because they all have been so supportive of their kids, and supportive of me. As I told them, we all feel as parents we know our children, and can predict with some certainty the way they think and the way they act.

We may have been knocked down, but we're getting back up. I pray if I am ever in the same predicament as they sadly found themselves, I hope I can be as gracious and level headed as they have been. I thank you all for your calls of support, emails, and concern for me. I also thank Nancy Nugget for the space in her paper It's been rough trail, but it looks better ahead. I hope to see you all out crouched behind a beautiful, bountiful, bubble-ish-ous blueberry bush!

Sincerely, Cussy Kauer Nome, AK

Dear Editor.

First and foremost, we would like to apologize to our community, family, friends, and above all, Cussy Kauer. The unthinkable actions that took place on the 5th of June are regretted whole-heartedly. We know that nothing will be able to make up for our actions. Forgiveness isn't expected anytime in the near future. All we can do is repent for our choices and do anything to ease the pain we have caused.

Throughout our lives, the community of Nome has supported us in everything we have done. All of us have strived to be role models for future generations. We are ashamed to say that what we have done lets down those who have looked after us, and those who looked up to us. We hope the people that looked up to us can learn from our mistakes and avoid the precarious situations that arrive from peer pressure. The reputation we spent our whole lives building was shattered in a matter of minutes. As a group, we hope to earn back the respect of the community through positive actions.

The wound that we left on our family names will be deep and the scar that remains will last for generations. Words can't describe the regret that we're feeling towards our parents, for they have to deal with the public humiliation. The consequences aren't ours to deal with alone. Future members of our families will be haunted by our actions in the years to come. We have not only brought ourselves down in the public eye, we have also dragged down everyone related to us.

Everyone who we have grown up with has also felt the affect of what we did. The utter disrespect we showed by lying and deceiving them has changed their views and opinions of us. The years we spent building up our friendships has been broken down instantly. They will never look at us the same and we don't expect them to. If we are able to rebuild the bond we once had, it won't be anytime soon.

Finally, we would like to send our deepest and sincerest apologies

Call for Candidates

What can we do for our town? The time to select candidates for our municipal elections is drawing near. The cut-off date is usually around mid-September, which is only a few weeks away. Where did the summer go? This year our town went through an intensely negative situation with our school board. We hope our city politicians have the concept of the necessity for open and transparent government.

We hope, but we can't rely on hope. We need to encourage Nomeites to get involved, to roll up their sleeves and bring local government into the light. We need candidates who don't have secret agendas, aren't carrying a set of cutlery, aren't a puppet, and don't have a silent vendetta. We need progressive, well-balanced, intelligent individuals who place the good of the town over their own interests. We need candidates with wisdom who love our town. We have these people, but they need to be encouraged to get into the political arena. We need to have them be willing to take time out of their busy schedule to help Nome move boldly into the future as a cohesive, allinclusive community. There is not much in the way of reward, only a small stipend and free health insurance coverage for some board and commission members.

There are seats on the Utility Board, City Council and School Board up for new members this year. Let's give considerable thought and encouragement for candidates who can uphold the fundamentals of good government. Had former President John Kennedy been a Nomeite he would have said, "Ask not what Nome can do for you, but what you can do for Nome." Get involved, give us some choices. Our town needs and deserves good government. - N.L.M.- AP— Alaska Department of Fish and Game Commissioner Denby Lloyd is accused of driving under the influence. Lloyd, 55, was arrested early Sunday in Juneau and taken to the Lemon Creek Correctional Center. His car was impounded, according to the police log. Booking officer Zarak Malacas said Lloyd had been released from custody and is scheduled for a court appearance Monday. Lloyd is charged with DUI and reckless endangerment, Malacas said. Gov. Sean Parnell's spokeswoman released a statement from Parnell saying he takes the matter very seriously. Parnell says if "the court system reveals guilt, swift and appropriate action will be taken."

Two eagles struck by Alaska Airlines planes

The saying that lighting never strikes twice was proven wrong in two incidents involving eagles and airplanes. An Alaska Airlines aircraft sent to Sitka on Sunday to replace Alaska Airlines Flight 68 after it was grounded by an eagle strike earlier that day, also hit an eagle on takeoff. The plane struck the second eagle on the runway, but it could continue on to Seattle. No injuries to plane crew or passengers were reported. Both eagles died in the encounters.

Two children die in boating accident

Alaska State Troopers report that boating accident near Kipnuk claimed the lives of two children, 2 and 6 years of age. The accident happened on Saturday, August 8. Troopers say that the boat struck the shore and flipped over. Everybody, including the children were ejected into the water and the children drowned. Kipnuk Search and Rescue Volunteer teams were launched to the area and recovered the remains of the children. They were not wearing lifejackets. The investigation is ongoing. U.S. District Court to remove an injunction against exploration activities under oil and gas leases in the Chukchi Sea. A federal judge on July 21 issued the injunction affecting the 2008 lease sale of 2.76 million acres. The leases brought in bids of nearly $2.7 billion. The judge did not vacate the leases but said the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management, Regulation and Enforcement must improve an environmental review that he ruled was deficient. Attorney General Dan Sullivan said that the injunction will put Alaskans out of work and on the other hand, risks to the environment would be minimal. Governor Parnell said the public interest would be hurt if the injunction stays in place as Alaskans would suffer from lost jobs and economic growth. In a clarification issued last week, the court said that Shell and Statoil USA E&P Inc., are allowed to conduct summer seismic testing in the leased areas.

The state has moved for reconsideration to have the injunction lifted entirely. The judge has yet to rule on that motion.

In other separate cases, the state fights federal government actions that Parnell claims threaten Alaska fisheries and jobs. President Barack Obama signed an executive order that sets a national policy for the stewardship of the ocean, coasts and Great Lakes and would create the National Ocean Council to strengthen ocean governance and coordination. The intent is to protect, maintain and restore the health and biological diversity of ocean, coastal and Great Lakes ecosystems and resources. Part of the National Ocean Council's mission would be to engage with state, tribal and local authorities. The state engages back and Parnell said that the federal bureaucracy would be too cumbersome already. He said that creating more councils, committees and approval processes won't accomplish anything except create delay and greater obstacles to Alaska jobs and Alaska fisheries. Parnell is concerned that the policy could have significant adverse impacts on commercial use and development in the oceans and coastal zone, impacting fishermen, boaters and resource developers. Scientists on the other hand have warned for years that overfishing and ocean pollution should be addressed at a national and international political level.

In a third case, the state's Department of Fish and Game is doing an evaluation of federal fishery restrictions. The National Marine Fisheries Service has proposed closing certain Alaska mackerel and cod fisheries to protect sea lions. The department of law is getting ready to sue to in order to "protect Alaskans' livelihoods and

And last but not least, the state of Alaska, along with 19 other states, filed a response to the Department of Justice's motion to dismiss the states' lawsuit that challenged the federal health care reform. Alaska et al challenge the constitutionality of the new health care law. Parnell calls the law a "power grab" that carries an unprecedented mandate for individuals to purchase a product in the marketplace or else pay a penalty. The states argued that they have standing to bring the lawsuit because the federal health care law negatively affects state sovereignty and provides additional stress on already lean state budgets. The lawsuit was originally filed in federal court in the Northern District of Florida on March 23, minutes after the health care reform act was signed into law by President Obama. The hearing on issues raised by the motion to dismiss will be held on September 14 in Pensacola before Judge Roger Vinson. Earlier this week, a judge in a similar lawsuit in Virginia ruled against the Department of Justice's motion to dismiss, allowing Virginia's lawsuit to move forward.

dredges prevents residents from hearing television programs and keeps them awake until 2 a.m. "We can't enjoy cooking and sitting at the river like we used to," he added.

"There are many other city, state and federal violations that are being committed here, oil and gas spills on both land and water, dumping of trash including honeybuckets into the river by some [who] live aboard dredges and the running of a dredge in a fish migration area which they do all the time to test their equipment," Scholten complained.

"This summer and fishing season is almost over," he noted. "Please remove these dredges, vehicles and all related equipment from our area. The city acted very fast three years ago when they started pitching tents down here but now they are building living quarters on their dredges and sleeping here anyway."

Scholten submitted with his letter more than a dozen photos showing vehicles and equipment blocking a fishing area and a play area for children; children at play along the riverbank; a tender boat for a dredge with sleeping quarters; out of state license plates and an expired tag on vehicles; equipment and trailers left on the site seven days a week; debris on the bank, grinding and welding in progress, and a dredge that has stayed in the river just off the bank for more than a year.

Mayor Denise Michels said she had received a couple of complaints similar to those expressed by Scholten, and so had City Manager Josie Bahnke. Michels noted that a request for proposals to develop a long-range plan for the Port of Nome is out to bid, and she suggested that the Port Commission include uses of the Snake River recreation area in the plan.

Councilman Stan Andersen said they are breaking the law by littering and abusing city property, so why not enforce the law?

Councilman Jim West, Jr. who chairs the port commission said problems at the site discussed during a commission meeting this summer. "I'd like to see it in a 5 or 10 year plan," he said.

"And push it off till next summer?" asked Andersen. He asked whether there are laws on the books to address Scholten's complaints.

Bahnke said the city has a noise ordinance, so Scholten can call the police about noise, but there is nothing in place in the Port of Nome regulations that addresses the Belmont area. Some of the complaints in Scholten's letter are policy issues and some are management issues, she added.

No critters allowed

The council found it much easier to address Erna Rasmussen's complaint about dog-do in Anvil City Park than Daniel Scholten's complaint about honeybuckets dumped in the Snake River.

In a letter to the council dated July 18, Rasmussen said while visiting the park with her granddaughter she had seen a box with the sign "Pet Waste-Transmits Disease" and a "Dog Waste Bags" sign. She said dogs do not belong in a children's playground.

"A couple of years ago, I approached the Dog Catcher and later I mentioned to a City Council Member about putting up signs "NO ANIMALS ALLOWED" on all four sides of the Anvil City Square," Rasmussen wrote. "I was assured that signs stating this would be up soon! And as of yet there are no such signs."

She asked that the council take down the pet waste signs in the park and put up signs saying "NO ANI-MALS ALLOWED!"

Councilman Jerald Brown said he fully agrees with Rasmussen's letter. "There was a big dog turd next to the slide when I took neighborhood kids to the park. It's a people park, not a dog park. I suggest we ban all animals."

"I agree," said Councilwoman Mary Knodel. Councilmen Andersen, Larson, Pomeranz and West also agreed to ban animals from the park. "What about other public places?" asked Bahnke. Council members indicated the animal ban would apply only to parks and the Middle Beach picnic area.

the para-rescuemen, radioed in that the they arrived on scene at 7:15 a.m. Tuesday, about 12 hours after the crash. Reports from the scene indicated a quarter mile visibility and less than a 100-foot ceiling along with high winds.

A U.S. Coast Guard C-130 hovered over the scene for communication support and would transport victims needing additional treatment in Anchorage once they reached Dillingham, according to the statement.

The National Transportation Safety Board has sent a team from Washington, D.C. to Dillingham to investigate the crash.

Stevens had survived the 1978 crash of a Learjet in Anchorage that killed his wife Ann and four others.

Stevens won the primary election in 2008, but then lost his seat for a seventh term in the Senate after a conviction on felony corruption charges. The federal court threw out the case later because prosecutors had withheld information from the defense. The case rested on Stevens' failure to disclose $250,000 in goods and services from VECO, an oil field service company.

Stevens has been a tall figure in Alaska politics since he was appointed to the Senate in 1968.

Stevens worked for Alaska statehood, one of his early major tasks during 60 years of public service. During his tenure in Washington, Stevens brought billions of federal dollars to Alaska and a decent share of that into Nome for infrastructure improvements through the Denali Commission.

Stevens is survived by wife Catherine, two sons and three daughter.

ceived two bids for 2,500 tons of aggregate, Alaska Aggregate submitted the low bid at $24.34 a ton, and the other bid was considerably higher. Alaska Aggregate has contracted with Alaska Gold to handle gravel, she added.

Councilman Jerald Brown said Sound Quarry, Inc., a subsidiary of Bering Straits Native Corp. (BSNC) had bid $28.95 a ton for the project. Brown is employed by BSNC.

The council adopted a resolution approving the City of Nome's application to the Alaska Municipal League to host the league's combined summer meeting in 2013.

Michael Irvin was sworn in as Police Officer I at the beginning of the meeting. He formerly served as police chief of Galena.

Liquor license transfer

The council considered a memorandum dated Aug. 2 from Joelene Kacena, city clerk secretary, asking whether the council has any objection to the transfer of a liquor license from Stanley Sobocienski, Bering Sea Saloon to Tomter Enterprises, doing business as Airport Pizza. The state notifies the city when a liquor license ownership transfer is pending.

The memo said the Bering Sea Saloon is delinquent in sales tax for October and December 2009. The city received Bering Sea sales tax returns of $1,150 on July 23, and the city manager signed a promissory note with Tomter Enterprises for the balance due pending approval of the license transfer, the memo said.

According to the memo, the Bering Sea Saloon changed hands Jan. 28, 2010 from Stanley Sobocienski to Columbus Sobocienski as sole owner, and is delinquent in first half real property taxes for 2010 and with Nome Joint Utilities for amounts that were unknown on Aug. 2. Utility manager John Handeland said the utility has filed a lien and has an agreement with Sobocienski for payment. If payment is not received before the license is sold, Handeland said he and the city attorney have agreed that Tomter can provide a certified check for the amount due after he receives the license.

Erna Rasmussen, whose home is located directly across the street from Airport Pizza, weighed in against transferring the Bering Sea Saloon liquor license to Tomter Enterprises in a letter to the council dated June 26. She noted that her eight-year-old granddaughter lives in her home, a number of other small children live in her neighborhood, and the Women's Shelter is in her neighborhood.

"Áirport Pizza already has a Beer and Wine License and that is more tha[n] enough liquor in this neighborhood," Rasmussen wrote. "Arctic Native Brotherhood with a Liquor License is only two blocks away from our house and in the neighborhood; we experience enough drunkenness and disorderliness from that for young children to experience as a negative way of life and a negative way to grow up. One of Nome's very few open Playgrounds for young people is immediately across the street from Airport Pizza. Further there are four Churches of Faith within a 250 feet or less than 1-1/2 Blocks radius of the proposed location."

Knodel asked Bahnke to send a copy of Rasmussen's letter to the state entity responsible for approving liquor license transfers.

Teen night activities

In a letter dated July 29 to Bahnke, Al Burgo asked the city to reduce the Mini Convention Center rental fee for Teen Night activities sponsored by Bush907. Burgo said Bush907 has offered services that help promote local businesses and events for local youth for more than 10 years in Nome.

"...Teen Night has proven to be a healthy and safe getaway from movies, video games and other less productive activities," he wrote. "Teens are able to socialize, hang out, listen to music and dance in a clean, secure, and supervised environment..." He said most Teen Night events attract more than 100

Andersen asked Police Chief John Papasodora whether there had been any problems at Teen Night events. Papasodora said problems occur outside the facility but not inside. He suggested that Bush907 provide adequate chaperones and plenty of advance notice to the police for each event.

Randy Pomeranz moved to approve reducing the facility use fee from $200 to $100 for each Teen Night event, Stan Anderson suggested including Papasodora's suggestions in the motion, and the council unanimously approved it.

Beware of musk oxen

Handeland told the council that his dog recently was severely injured by a muskox at the base of Anvil Mountain while trying to protect Handeland's friend. He said the dog has survived with medical care that cost thousands of dollars. "Musk oxen may be as big a threat as bears," he said. Handeland warned that cross-country runners now training on trails and roads around Nome may encounter aggressive musk oxen.

Char Keehn reported that musk oxen had broken a fence and tipped over dog houses on her property two weeks ago. She said a dog had saved herself by slipping out of her collar.

- The Public Works road crew completed improvements to the Sunset Firing Range for the Nome Sportsman Association on Aug. 2 in 132 hours of work.
- The City learned on Aug. 5 that Kiewit-Manson, Inc. has committed to replacing corroded expansion joints in fuel lines under the causeway bridge. A "white paper" Bahnke prepared states that Kiewit installed incorrect values under the bridge and the fuel lines are at risk of failure. "The six corroded values are in very poor condition and it is imperative that they be removed and the correct equipment be installed during the off-season winter months 2010-2011," she wrote. Kiewit was the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers contractor for the expansion joint installation.

Muskoxen pose a hazard

By Sandra L. Medearis

Muskoxen, shaggy relics from the Ice Age have multiplied over the Seward Peninsula since their reintroduction 40 years ago, long after overhunting had made them vanish from the area by the 1880s.

Careful management has allowed the numbers to increase so that a harvestable surplus exists. However concern also exists that the muskoxen revival has been too successful-presenting a threat to residents and their domestic animals.

The Nome Common Council Monday evening said a letter would be written asking state game management agencies to look at a solution for increasing numbers of muskoxen foraging near town and populated areas of Anvil Mountain. Councilwoman Mary Knodel made the suggestion after John Handeland told the Council a large bull had savagely attacked his Rottweiler at the base of Anvil Mountain.

Handeland and a friend were enjoying the beauty of the countryside when suddenly a herd of muskoxen converged "with my pet in the middle. The next scene seemed unreal, as my 100 plus pound dog was flying through the air, landed and then came up riding on upturned horns," Handeland said. The pet was flown to Anchorage where it was under treatment Monday.

"Hours of surgery and thousands of dollars later, untold suffering—he is not out of the woods, but we are hoping for his survival."

Char Keehn, resident of Tripple Creek near Dexter said her dogs had suffered run-ins with muskoxen many times, that she had shot a muskox last Four pets have been injured recently, Handeland said. He offered a warning that more aggressive hunting or some control by game managers was needed, especially with the beginning of school 10 days away when crosscountry athletes would be running through the countryside.

Michels said she will meet with Sen. Lisa Murkowski, U.S. Coast Guard Commandant Robert J. Papp, Mrs. Papp and several other Coast Guard officials to discuss Arctic issues on Aug. 12 in Nome.

In a letter to Bahnke dated July 29, the Rev. Ross Tozzi of St. Joseph Catholic Church requested permission to conduct a March of Tears to the Nome Cemetery at 10:30 a.m. Aug. 28 in remembrance of victims of sexual abuse who have died.

"In response to the hurt and suffering caused by the sexual abuse crisis in the Catholic Church and in Nome Landfill. the Diocese of Fairbanks, the Catholic Bishop of northern Alaska is visiting all of the cities and villages where abuse took place in order to offer healing ceremonies and listening sessions," Tozzi wrote. "As part of this diocesan wide effort, the Bishop of Fairbanks along with the other bishops of Alaska plan to travel to Nome for services on 28 and 29 August."

Executive session

The council held an executive session following the regular meeting. The written agenda topics were "Property Matters: Gold Hill Tutit Ininat Child Care Building" and "Block 63, Lot 13." Bahnke told The Nome Nugget that block 63, lot 13 is across from Quality Auto Parts in a assets of Harbor Crown Seafoods.

Siu President John Eckels described the property Aug. 5 at an NSEDC board meeting in Nome. He said the small plant was built in 2005 and comes with modern processing and freezing equipment. Eckels showed slides of other buildings and a dock at the site. The buildings include a bunkhouse with dorm rooms, a mall building once used for store rentals, a building currently leased by a business and a World War II era shipyard with transit rails. Eckels said Dutch Harbor Acquisitions has obtained leaseholder rights to land at the property site.

Eckels refused to make public the price Dutch Harbor Acquisitions paid for the property. A foreclosure sale advertisement for the Harbor Crown Seafoods property pegs its assessed value at $4.8 million. Bob Martin of Ravenwood Real Estate in Eagle River and Lee Henry of RE/MAX Properties in Anchorage handled the sale and accepted offers for the property until June 21.

According to the ad, Alaska Growth Capital of Anchorage foreclosed on the property because of a loan default by Ken & John Enterprises, owner of Harbor Crown Seafoods. The ad also said the annual land rent for the property, $276,000, was under review by the landlord, Ounalashka Corp.

Eckels said Copper Seafoods will operate the plant under the trade name Bering Star Fisheries LLC and plans to begin operations by the end of this year. The plant initially will purchase and process halibut, Pacific cod and black cod (sablefish), and will move into crab processing as soon as possible, he added.

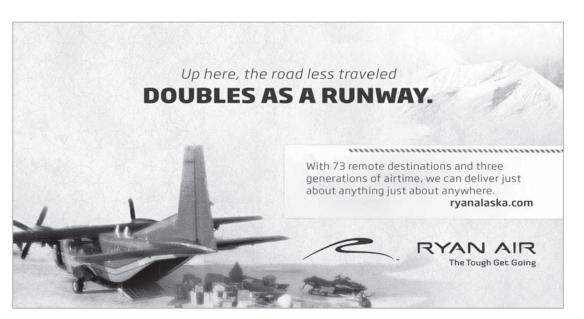

NSEDC board member Joe Garnie of Teller asked Eckels whether the new venture will include entry-level employment opportunities for residents of Bering Strait communities. He noted that a fire-damaged store on the property needed to be repaired and painted.

"That's a good idea," replied Eckels, adding that a maintenance crew may be needed for three or four months. He said he has discussed with Copper River Seafoods representatives the potential for long-term jobs at the plant for residents of Bering Strait communities and will talk with them about maintenance jobs. He said the firm has provided training classes for workers from the Bristol Bay area. NSEDC also provides training for seafood processors through its Education, Employment and Training program, noted Janis Ivanoff, the firm's chief executive

According to a press release provided by Eckels, Copper River Seafoods' partners in Western Alaska Ventures are Stuart and Benett Kozloff, owners of International Seafood Ventures in Seattle, and James Gonzalez, owner of Pacific Harvest Seafood, Bellevue, WA. Eckels said Siu Alaska and Western Alaska Ventures each own 50 percent of Dutch Harbor Acquisitions.

In addition to salmon, Copper River Seafoods produces halibut and cod products with five operating companies and plants in Southeastern Alaska, central Alaska, Togiak and the Bristol Bay region. "We are excited about the opportunity to expand into the Bering Sea and Aleutian chain regions with such strategic partners," said Scott Blake, president of Copper River Seafoods.

NSEDC represents 15 Bering Strait communities in the Western Alaska Community Development (CDQ) Program. The company receives allocations of the total allowable catch of groundfish and crab in the Bering Sea and Aleutian Islands through the CDQ program. In addition, NSEDC owns quota for red king crab, snow crab and golden king crab, and owns Individual Fishing Quota for halibut and sablefish.

White Alice in limbo

By Sandra Medearis

Almost 12 acres of Anvil Mountain top around the White Alice antennas remain fenced off while the USAF removes contaminants from the soil.

This week movement forward or back on keeping the Cold War icons or demolishing them stood idle with no decision on the fate of the remnants of Anvil Mountain Radio Relay Station.

The USAF plans to follow removal of PCB contamination by tearing down the antennas to remove asbestos threats. When the site is squeaky clean, the land will pass through a federal clearinghouse at BLM to insure decontamination and land ownership before handing it over to Sitnasuak Native Corp.

Meanwhile, support has developed among those who have affection for the four towers on the mountain skyline, as well as among travelers who use the landmarks for safety and local amateur radio operators who use the towers for transmissions to support Nome Search and Rescue and sports coverage.

The City of Nome has applied for a special use permit for the land, should it pass to SNC, in order to sit down at SNC's land committee table to discuss preservation of the towers, part of a system that networked the state in the 1950s and 1960s to warn of Soviet attack and extended communications to remote settlements and villages.

"It is the desire of the City of Nome to retain the integrity of the antennas and maintain them for life, safety and historical reasons," Josie Bahnke, city manager, wrote in a July letter to the Sitnasuak Native Corp. land committee. "The City is willing to assume responsibility to limit SNC's liability exposure."

Monday evening Bahnke told the Nome Common Council at its regular meeting that SNC was preparing a counter offer.

In 1997, the White Alice issue came up when the USAF wanted to clean up the towers and land to transfer it to City of Nome. The land at that time was not available for SNC to select under Native land claim rights.

In 1997, the Nome Common Council passed a resolution urging the USAF to use Bering Straits Development Co.'s 8(a) designation to use local people to clean up the site to save money and push the project along, according to John Handeland, mayor of Nome in 1997. An 8 (a) designation allows the government to negotiate directly with a sole source provider without going out to bid.

But the USAF did not respond. White Alice cleanup apparently went to the back burner until two years ago when the USAF did more test samples at the site.

"At that point, the City was still assuming the work was to clean up the site so the Air Force could transfer White Alice to the City," Handeland, now utilities manager, said Monday.

However, last year Congress made federal reserves like Anvil Mountain Radio Relay Station available for Native land selection.

Currently the site belongs to the Air Force. Cleanup, even if it meant demolition, would allow BLM to accept the site for transfer to SNC. SNC has indicated a willingness to work with the City to avoid demolition of the towers, but does not want to burden shareholders with maintenance costs after cleanup.

WEATHER CHANNEL? —White Alice towers on Anvil Mountain come through the fog Monday to signal passage of a morning rainstorm. For half a century, people have been able to glance through north windows at the antennas to gauge weather for travel safety or know whether a plane will land. The antennas have been an important source where moss does not grow on the north side of trees and the groundhog looks for his shadow in the dark. Proposed removal of the towers would leave the hilltop shaved as smooth as, well, you know.

HYDRATE-The Davis herd are working on hydrating.

Reindeer herding holds great future for Seward Peninsula

By Diana Haecker

Through the drizzle and fog a helicopter appears over the hills east of the Nome-Teller Highway near the Eldorado River shelter cabin. The small R-22 hovers, lands and Donny Olson climbs out. His wife Willow has already been waiting for him, trying to keep their two young sons Martin and Junior entertained as they waited for hours for dad to come back to this makeshift gas station at the side of the road. As soon as the helicopter lands, the kids are antsy to get out of the car and into the heli's cockpit to play Buzz Lightyear while Olson is filling up gas.

Most know Donald Olson as a medical doctor and the Alaska State Senator for district T. But on this rainy day in late July, he is living his heritage, as he is the great-grandson of a Saami reindeer herder who came to Alaska to teach the locals the art of reindeer husbandry.

While the helicopter rotator blades are whizzing, Olson finishes gassing up, lifts the kids out of the cockpit and then heads out again. His mission is to complete the round-up of Teller's Kakaruk/Lee reindeer herd and to drive them into the corral with the aid of three walkers. Reindeer herding in this way is possible because the animals stick together when danger looms, unlike their wild cousins, the caribou, which scatter when seeing a predator come near. At the corral, the herd is supposed to get counted, fawns are tagged, bulls not meant to procreate are castrated so they can fatten up and not expend energy on sparring during the rut. Also, the antlers are cut. But during this summer's round-up, only a fraction of the animals were processed in that

The inclement weather didn't play in favor of the roundup. It started with the difficulty to find the herd and to keep them together.

"Due to the low visibility, our biggest fear was that they run off into the hills and into clouds, where we would have lost them," said Olson. Driving the herd from the air is a dangerous task as the helicopter hovers only up to eight feet above the ground. "Things can happen pretty fast when you're that low to the ground," Olson said. To make his point, he gestures to the hills and said that the pioneer of helicopter herding, Jim Isabell was killed in a helicopter crash there in the early 1980s.

The summer reindeer roundup is a big community event and despite the incessant rain, wind and cool temperatures, nearly 50 people from Teller climbed into their motor skiffs that it is easier to train a knowledgeable herder to fly a helicopter than to train a pilot to get a feel for the reindeer. While the helicopter flies back to the road to gas up, the walkers keep the herd safe and together. They are armed with guns to fend off bears and took the uncomfortable boat ride upriver to the reindeer corral where Canyon Creek meets the Kuzitrin and Imruk Basin. In exchange for reindeer meat and the excitement of the roundup, the community helps out in the ritual of counting, castrating and cutting. For the herder, it means writing up a huge shopping list, getting groceries from Nome and hauling all that up to the corral to feed the people who came to help.

But just as Olson had rounded up the reindeer and pushed approximately 1,700 head into the corral, wind had picked up and blew over the fence. Half of the rounded up animals escaped as a result. Olson said that in the previous year, things went smoother and he managed to round up 2,800 reindeer.

Beyond mastering the flying part, Olson explained that helicopter herding requires a sense for the herd and the animals. "To drive them you need a cowboy sense and you need to know how to direct the animals, so that you don't drive them to exhaustion," Olson explained. He added or wolves. Olson said as the deer get a break from being driven, they eat and drink, have some time to rest up before the final push into the corral.

At the corral, Leslie Davis, a graduate student with the University of Alaska Fairbanks Reindeer Research Program had 20 GPS tracker collars and 10 satellite collars to put on reindeer. She studies the animal's breeding behavior and habitat selection. Before the males go into rut, she flies out into the field, tracks "her" animals and counts the amount of females in one harem before and after the rut. In addition, she hopes to find if size matters even in the reindeer world as she researches the relationship between antler-size and the size of a bull's harem. Davis also tries to shed light on the mystery of the reindeer's habitat selection during the fall. "During spring and early summer we know that they eat willows, later, in late July to August, they eat a mix of lichens and sedges, but we don't have a good understanding of their fall habitat selection and breeding," Davis said.

According to the reindeer research program, reindeer are found throughout Alaska, on Nunivak Island, the Pribilof Islands and some of the Aleutian Islands. Researchers estimate that two-thirds of the approximately 18,000 reindeer in the state are found on the Seward Peninsula. Of those, UAF's Reindeer Research Program manager Greg Finstad said, Teller's Kakaruk herd is the biggest intact herd. The herd is managed by herd manager Julia Lee. Lee was not available for an interview for this story.

Finstad said while the range land on the Seward Peninsula is in excellent condition, the culprit for the decline in reindeer roaming the range is the Western Arctic Caribou Herd. The wild cousins simply steal the reindeer away from their herders. "We lost three-quarters of the Seward Peninsula reindeer herds to the caribou," Finstad said. Herders like Merlin Henry in Koyuk had fought hard to keep their herd just to see it being taken away by caribou. Finstad said that Henry came up with a method to keep his reindeer from wandering off. He would get his animals used to being in an enclosure and be fed rations provided by humans. When the caribou show up, he'd bring his reindeer into the enclosure and once the caribou herd is gone again, he turns his reindeer out on the range again. Finstad said, this works well. While the Teller herd has not been affected too much by caribou, predation by bears and wolves is the biggest problem for the Kakaruk herd. However, he also said that the herder is taking good care of the herd and thus manages to keep the numbers of animals lost to predation down.

He said that other herds include the Davis herd around Nome consisting of a widely ranging number of 500 to 2,000 animals, Tom Gray's herd in White Mountain with approximately 50 animals. There is also a large herd of 2,000 to 3,000 reindeer on St. Lawrence Island, owned by the Savoonga IRA, and a small herd owned by Merlin Henry in Koyuk. Rose Fosdick, executive director of the Reindeer Herders Association said there are approximately 10,000 reindeer on the Seward Peninsula.

Besides fighting off caribou and large predators, a challenge for herders is also the logistical task to slaughter, process the meat properly and to get it USDA inspected and brought to market. "There is a huge market out there for Alaskan reindeer meat," said Finstad. The program he oversees is geared to develop and promote the Alaskan reindeer industry. Their research spans topics from

Satellite outage affects Internet, long distance services

By Diana Haecker

A GCI communications satellite gone out of control is projected to interfere with other communication satellites affecting internet, long distance and cell phone services in Northwest Alaska this week.

In April, a communications satellite called Galaxy-15 malfunctioned and since then is no longer taking commands from earthly ground stations. While it is still sending and receiving data, it's deviated from its orbital course and is going to pass in the path of one of GCI's "good" satellites, Galaxy-18. The two satellites, weighing 4,000 pounds at a length of 46 feet, will come within 23 miles of each other this week. G-18, the good satellite, is GCI's primary communications satellite and delivers long distance voice, data, tele-health, distance learning and Internet services throughout rural Alaska, G-15 will interrupt GCI's satellite delivered services as it approaches G-18's assigned orbital location. It will pick up G-18's signals and scramble the data. GCI spokesman David Morris likens it to a roomful of people talking at the same time and one wouldn't be able to discern individual voices. He said that technicians on the ground can't turn the satellite off and that it aimlessly drifts across the sky. Morris added that this is a highly unusual event.

Projected outages will occur between Wednesday, August 11, and Saturday, Au-

Affected are internet service, cell phone and long distance calls. Morris said that the internet will be down throughout the region. The Nome hospital received alternative equipment, Morris said, that will allow it to stay online for tele-health services. "But the health clinics in the villages will go dark internet-wise," Morris said.

GCI long distance customers in Nome will be able to make long distance calls, but the surrounding villages won't be able to. Morris said that GCI provides a tollfree number for the villages to relay a long distance call through. The number is 1-888-991-8199.

Morris said that 911 calls from Gambell, Shungnak, Kiana, Ambler and Deering will be affected. While these villages do have 911 service – unlike 70 percent of villages in Northwest Alaska - it may not work during the outage.

Local calls within Nome or the villages won't be impacted and there will be cable TV.

The interruption of internet service also means that credit, debit and Quest card transactions won't be processed.

Nome's AC store manager Mike Mc-Nally said at press time on Monday that he is trying to get a GCI technician to Nome to install some equipment that would allow credit, debit card and Quest card processing. "At this time, we are not going to be able to run credit, debit or Quest cards," said McNally. "I'm planning for the worst." In the event that the worst-case scenario is happening, he asks customers to bring cash or pay with a check when shopping at AC during the satellite outages.

Wells Fargo store manager Scotty Watkins, however, is not as worried. "We did get the message from GCI and we are able to manually process credit cards," said Watkins. "Even if our internet goes down, we can process transactions," he said.

Outage times are anticipated to start on Wednesday, August 11 between 7 a.m. and 8:30 a.m. and 6 p.m. to 10:00 p.m.; Thursday, from 6 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. and 5 p.m. to 10:30 p.m.; Friday, August 13 from 5 a.m. to 10 a.m. and 5:30 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. and Saturday from 5 a.m. to 9:30 a.m.

Morris said that the run-away satellite eventually will drift another 18 degrees longitude off his orbit, and that it will continue to interfere with other communication satellites until it will slowly lose its earth lock. At that point it will shut down and fall into space to become space junk. He said he doesn't expect outages herd management and animal health to nutrition and meat quality to benefit the reindeer herders. Finstad said that they closely work together with Kawerak's Reindeer Herders Associ-

He said that almost every major meat distributor in Alaska is looking to buy reindeer meat and that meat processors are literally waiting in line to get their hands on good quality reindeer meat. Reindeer meat is valued because it is tender and tasty while rich in protein, high in minerals and low in fat and cholesterol.

"They even buy up caribou meat from Canada and reindeer from Scandinavia to put in their sausages," said Finstad. "If there was a way to slaughter the reindeer in Teller, that herd would generate millions of dollars," Finstad added. The hold-up is not having a method to get the reindeer meat USDA inspected for sale. This, Finstad hopes, could be alleviated as the research program bought a mobile slaughter unit that would also allow an USDA inspection. Finstad said as the college works the kinks out of the unit, he plans to teach workshops and to train people to knowledgeably process reindeer meat to have it USDA inspected on the spot and shipped to Alaska meat processors. The mobile unit is currently stored at Northwest Campus in Nome, and Finstad hopes to take it to the villages in years to come for training and workshop sessions. Part of his intention is to get young people excited about the prospect that reindeer could bring economic growth to the region. Bringing up a new crop of herders seems equally challenging as the predation problems. "Right now, all the younger folks see that it's a lot of hard work to keep reindeer, but we want to show them that it could be a way to make a very good living on the Seward Peninsula," said Finstad.

Under a special waiver given to Seward Peninsula herder, they can slaughter reindeer when there is snow on the ground and temperatures are below freezing. But this only supplies food for subsistence use and once in a while reindeer meat from a local herd can be found in freezers in Nome's grocery stores. Finstad said that Alaska offers a range of 15 million acres that would be suitable for reindeer production. "We should be able to sustainably produce 50,000 to 100,000 animals,' said Finstad. He added that the research program has done extensive research on keeping reindeer in fenced enclosures with good results. But he said the Chukotkan reindeer that were introduced to Alaska in the have expired on Monday, August 9. The cold case involves a kidnapping, rape and assault on a woman in Anchorage, dated to August 9, 2000. Svobodny said that he wants to get the message across that the department will never rest when such heinous crimes remain unpunished.

1890s by Sheldon Jackson are a breed that likes to stay on the range and unlike caribou doesn't like to wander around too much.

Finstad said the reindeer present at the Seward Peninsula is the result of an artificial selection by humans and although they run free, they easily socialize with humans - as evidenced by the infamous Velvet Eyes, the domesticated reindeer often seen riding around Nome in the back of her owner, Carl Emmons' truck. But in terms of meat production, Finstad said that he believes in the reindeer industry and that the Seward Peninsula could sustain 50,000 to 75,000 reindeer. "It would be good for the villages, the people and we could produce a fabulous product," says

While reindeer have contributed their meat to feed humans for more than 5,000 years, Donny Olson said his connection to the animals runs deeper than meat production consid-

Olson said his ancestors on both sides of the family had reindeer herding in their blood and he feels an affinity to the animal and the reindeer culture. "They are majestic and magical animals," he said. "They are remarkable in the sense that they sometimes give birth in blizzards and the fawn has to get up and run within minutes after birth. It's an interesting animal not just to herd but I really enjoy being around them.'

Bering Strait School District

School Starts Monday, August 23, 2010

Welcome back to school!

Bering Strait School District
Building bridges between tomorrow & today

Dear new and returning students,

Welcome to another great year in the Bering Strait School District!

Students all across the region are eagerly getting ready for the start of school. Parents are ready to send their children to school. Teachers and principals are excited about the start of school. As your new superintendent, I am very excited about the possibilities that await us this school year as we create excellent educational opportunities for the students of the Bering Strait Region.

The first day of school is Aug 23.

There is much that is sacred and beautiful about the work that happens in schools; however, there is much that is difficult. Successful schools do the hard work; they include parents as partners. Together, the teachers and parents ask the hard questions such as: Are all students reading at grade level by the third grade? Are all of our students graduating with a diploma that is relevant to their aspirations, and does that diploma prepare them for success? The hard work of education happens in a classroom, on a desk, where the point of a pencil touches a piece of paper, and the kind words of a teacher touch the heart of a child. However, the work that occurs in a classroom can achieve far greater results when the parents are included as partners in the educational process. Parents, your teachers need your help.

As we go forth into this new school year, let us remember that there is no limit to what can be accomplished when good people surround a common vision and do what is in the best interest of children. Last year, BSSD achieved remarkable results. Eight of our fifteen schools made AYP. The schools that did not make AYP did achieve growth in one or more academic areas. There is great cause for celebration but great urgency for the work that remains. We need to continue getting our three and four year old students school ready and focusing on reading, writing and math fluency for all of our students.

Every school in our district is the heart of the community. All stakeholders (the teachers and principals, the support staff, the regional partners, tribal governments, the advisory education committees, the school board, the district office staff, every community member, our elders, parents and students) must all beat as one single heartbeat. We are all teachers. Parents, you are your child's most important teacher. But we need to think of the BSSD children as our children, and we must work together in guaranteeing the success of every single child. We need to continue reaching out to each other, listening to each other, and learning from each other. One single heartbeat.

Our School Board has adopted an aggressive 5-year strategic plan:

- 1. We will review and revise standards, curriculum, instructional methods, assessments and recording/reporting procedures.
- 2. We will develop and implement programs that promote cultural heritage.

- 3. We will develop a comprehensive career and technical (vocational) curriculum and delivery system to serve all students and develop specific plans to help students successfully transition to life after high school.
- 4. We will develop and promote family, community and regional partnerships to support students.
- 5. We will annually review graduation, dropout and attendance data and create/revise specific action plans.

Our Mission: We will educate our children to become self sufficient and contributing citizens through quality programs that reflect our children's heritage.

There is an old saying that the best time to plant a tree was 30 years ago. Even though we are primarily tundra, there are many trees throughout our district—our children. When we teach, let us work together and believe that we teach forever in the hearts and imaginations of children, and continue building a school district that honors the rich cultural heritage of our communities, a school district that is special, where parents are welcomed and made to feel a part of the team, where teachers are valued and involved in the decision making process, and where every child loves to learn. I believe the second best time to plant a tree is now!

Thank You,

Rob Picou Superintendent

Silvers dominate salmon catch as chum run dwindles

By Jim Menard, Alaska Dept. of Fish & Game

Commercial fishers caught more silver (coho) salmon than chum salmon in Norton Sound last week. Chum salmon have shown record strength on the tail end of the run, as would be expected with the strong showing of fouryear old chums this year.

The department will look to expand commercial fishing time in subdistricts where silver salmon are showing good run strength and there is buyer capacity. The dwindling harvests of other salmon will allow the buyer to take more silver salmon.

The Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest so far this season totals 98 kings, 71 sockeyes, 31,826 pinks, 110,350 chums and 23,603 silvers.

Beach seining is no longer allowed in the Unalakleet and Shaktoolik subdistricts. Subsistence gillnet fishing is allowed seven days a week. Sport fishing for king salmon is closed in the Unalakleet River and the Shaktoolik River, and the use of bait is prohibited. Any king salmon incidentally hooked while targeting other fish species must be immediately released.

In the Nome subdistrict, the set gillnet subsistence fishing schedule in marine waters is 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Saturday by regulation. The fresh water subsistence area set gillnet schedule is 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday, and 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday. Beach seining is not allowed.

All limits on chum and pink salmon have been waived in the subsistence areas. The Penny and Cripple rivers remain closed to chum salmon fishing by regulation. The sport fish bag and possession limit on pink salmon has been raised from 10 a day to 20 a day.

The red king crab catch in the open access fishery totaled 235,000 pounds on Sunday morning, Aug. 8, with 135,000 pounds of quota remaining. The trend line is tracking comparable to recent years, and the 2010 catch has not shown the big fall off that occurred the first week of August last year.

Kotzebue district

Some permit holders disregarded the buyer's request that they fish shorter hours due to the buyer's capacity concerns, so the department is now setting the fishing periods each day. The previous schedule of eight-hour fishing periods is no longer in effect.

It is likely that fishing period hours will vary daily for one more week, and then the commercial fishery will resume with a regular schedule.

The catch through Aug. 7 totaled 146,694 chum salmon for 45 fishermen. The catch is on track to be the best harvest since 1995.

WASHED ASHORE-The carcass of a dead whale washed ashore near Port Clarence.

Killer whale pods migrate through Norton Sound

By Gay Sheffield

Killer whales made their way through Norton Sound on August 6, 2010 and were about a mile off shore. This particular pod was no more than 5 whales. Killer whales are not uncommon to see during the ice-free months and will travel all the way to Barrow in the Beaufort Sea.

The killer whales we have in this area are called transient killer whales. Unlike fish-eating killer whales that live in large groups in certain areas, transient killer whales constantly travel in small pods (5-10 individuals) and target marine mammals as their prey. Walruses, seals, and even large whales can become killer whale meals.

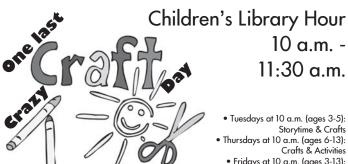

A dead killer whale recently washed up near Port Clarence. This whale had been on the beach so long that bears had eaten the large dorsal fin, and all the teeth were already gone. A skin sample was collected by the Alaska Department of Fish and Game in Nome and sent to the National Marine Fisheries Service for genetics testing. We hope to learn where this whale came from.

Killer whales are a powerful and important animal in our waters. Remember to contact coastal elders as well as local biologists in our region for interesting perspectives and knowledge regarding killer whales in the Bering Strait region.

Crossword: How Word Games Help the Brain

Bob Lawrence, MD Alaska Family Doctor

The human brain is an amazing organ made up of 100 billion specialized cells, called neurons, each with 1,000 to 10,000 connections, called synapses, to other neurons forming a network that can store a lifetime of memories, solve life's most complex problems, and instantly turn thought into words or action.

Like the rest of the body, the brain needs to be exercised to avoid deterioration of the complex network of neurons and synapses. According to research, word games, like crossword puzzles, provide the necessary neurological workout to keep the brain sharp.

For example, research from 2003 reported in the New England Journal of Medicine, showed that elderly persons who worked crossword puzzles at least four times a week were 47 percent less likely to develop dementia, like Alzheimer's disease, compared with those who worked less than one puzzle weekly.

Further research shows that word games and puzzles help even those with early signs of dementia. A study published in the journal Neurology last fall shows that the decline in cognitive functions is delayed by 1.29 years in elderly persons who regularly participate in leisure activities that exercise the brain.

Word games and puzzles seem to help prevent or delay the decline in brain function by building up what experts call "cognitive reserve." Over time, the brain, like most parts of the body, slows in function and speed. This slowing is thought to result from the death of brain cells or the loss of connections between cells due to toxins, alcohol, poor cardiovascular health, protein deposition (Alzheimer's disease), or mere disuse. Experts believe only about 30 percent of brain deterioration over time is due to genetic factors.

A dysfunctional group of neurons is like a blocked road. In a sense this is what happens when you cannot remember a person's name. You know the face, but there is a major roadblock between the neurons that recognize the person and the neurons that store the name of that person. In order to remember the name, your brain goes through a complex process of trying multiple detours around the block until a connection is made and the name comes to mind.

Building cognitive reserve is like paving new roads all throughout the brain, so if any one path is blocked, an alternate route can be found. Crossword puzzles are an excellent way to build this network of alternate roads. For example, think of a five-letter word that starts with the letter "S", has a middle letter "A", and means intelligent. The brain tries several routes to the answer. The word "clever" has too many letters. "Quick" can mean intelligent but does not contain the correct letters. Two correct options could come to mind: "smart" or "sharp." The correct answer, which will probably be printed in next week's paper, is not as important as the process, which not only solidifies the brain's connections to the correct word but has also strengthened the pathways to every word that comes to mind as a possibility.

Other activities proven to exercise the brain and slow the rate of cognitive decline include: playing board games, working number puzzles, learning to dance, playing cards, playing an instrument, or learning a new language. Daily aerobic activity has also been shown to increase brain volume and processing speed.

Experts agree, the decline in brain function that leads to dementia in later life can have many causes, and therefore, prevention must take many forms. Participating in daily physical and mental activities, while avoiding known toxins and eating healthy brain foods like fish, vegetables, fruits, berries, and nuts can prevent the deterioration of an otherwise healthy brain. Even in cases where dementia is genetic, keeping the brain in top shape and building up the "cognitive reserve" with word games is a proven way to turn back the clock.

Plane crash strands five on glacier

A group of five sightseeing tourists and their pilot were stranded on Knik Glacier after their plane went down. A Palmer resident took out-of-state friends on a one hour sightseeing trip on Sunday. The Alaska Air National Guard was called and launched an HH-60 Pave Hawk and HC-130 Hercules with para-rescuemen onboard to the site, but a snowstorm at the glacier and bad weather prevented from landing and getting the people out. The tourists had no survival gear and were only wearing light clothing. Four guardsmen were dropped off to hike in and rescue them. As of press time on Monday, they have not been recovered yet.

Ora Ayuqi Irrigoo Gologergen

Ora Ayuqi Irrigoo Gologergen was born on February 17, 1916 to Samuel and Flora Qenaaghaq Irrigoo at Gambell. She married Edward in 1943 and moved to Savoonga to a ready-made family, who she lovingly embraced. She died July 29, she was 94 years old.

Grandma often talked about her childhood growing up in Gambell. She and her cousin Harriet Waala Konahuk, did everything together, since they had lost both their mothers while young. She talked of her family in Gambell a lot, telling stories of how she grew up.

Her family always took in visitors from Chaplino (Russia) and the mainland Alaska and being gifted with the understanding of languages, she learned Inupiat and Russian.

Ayuqi was a teacher for the B.I.A. school in Savoonga for 23 years until B.I.A. closed their education operation and The Bering Strait School District. took over. She was a strict teacher, believing in a good education for all her students. She always mentioned how Merrill Annogiyuk and Warren Toolie thanked her for teaching them. She was also involved with The Alaska Territorial Guard while living in Gambell.

She continued her husband's duties at the Presbyterian Church; often called to serve by the church clergy, whether in Savoonga or to travel outside. Her last duty was to give a blessing at the new school last year.

She was the matriarch of the family. She gave all her love to her children and many grandchildren, nieces and nephews, her family and her people. She also enjoyed visits from family and friends, especially her grandchildren. She loved to tell the history of the way of life on the island. She sewed clothing for her children and grandchildren.

She was honored to have friends from all over the U.S. and part of Russia. She easily made friends everywhere she went. She regularly corresponded with Rev. Billy Graham and friends, until she couldn't see very well.

She was on the first Alaska Airlines Friendship Flight to Moscow, along with some Comedy Players, choir teams and dignitaries from Alaska. She was really overjoyed to see her old friends at Chaplino.

She had a great sense of humoralways making visitors, far and near, laugh heartily. Someone once asked her if she was aware of Bill Clinton
